OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce" was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "routes," to strike out "across the Pacific Ocean or to ports of the South Atlantic" and insert "to South America, to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and to Australasia," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to pay for ocean mail service under the act of March 3, 1891, in vessels of the second class on routes to South America, to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and to Australasia, 4,000 miles or more in length, outward voyage, at a rate per mile not exceeding the rate applicable to vessels of the first class as provided in said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to explain it. Is it the same as the bill we discussed at the last session?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that it is an entirely different bill. This bill simply extends the mail act of 1891 to ships of the second class; that is, it gives them the same pay that ships of the first class are now receiving. In other words, under the existing law ships of 20 knots receive $4 per mile on the outward voyage. This bill proposes to amend that law by giving the same compensation to ships of the second class, which are ships of 16 knots an hour.

It is believed that this legislation will result in establishing lines of steamships, one at least to Australasia and two at least to South America, the cost of which will not be in excess, as it is believed, of the profits that are now derived from our ocean mail service.

I will say to the Senator that an elaborate report has been made, which I trust he has had time to read. The Committee on Commerce were not much divided on this question. It is not in the nature of a subsidy, which has been so strongly opposed, but it is simply extending a law which has been in operation since 1891 and concerning which, so far as I know, no objection has ever been raised.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that I have not read the report. I have only read the bill. I think I received the report this morning, but I have been so busy that I have not had time to read it. I do not know what position I shall take in regard to the bill until I can carefully consider it. Does the Senator want it passed on now?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not, unless the Senate is ready to act on it. I have no disposition to crowd the bill unduly.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that I have no disposition to delay the bill if it deals simply with mail facilities and proposes merely to give better mail facilities.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is absolutely all it does.

Mr. CLAY. That is a different matter from the subsidy bills we have been discussing in previous Congresses. If the Senator will let the bill go over, I will have no objection to naming a day for its consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, acting on the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the routine morning business, this bill may be taken up for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be taken up for consideration on Monday next after the close of the routine morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

In case it shall be determined at any future time to locate or carry any public street or highway across said track the cost and expense thereof shall be borne and defrayed by the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, in the manner provided in section 10 of the act of Congress providing for a Union Station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved February 28, 1903.

SEC. 5. That where the line as approved by said Commissioners lies within the bed of any public highway or through any public space, said company is hereby given the right to occupy such portion of said highway as may be approved by said Commissioners, and where such approved route crosses private property the said railroad company is hereby authorized to acquire a sufficient right of way by purchase, and in the event that said right of way can not be purchased at a price satisfactory to said railroad company, authority is hereby conferred upon said railroad company to condemn the land necessary for such right of way, in the manner and by the method and processes provided by sections 648 to 663, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, which said sections, despite any repeal thereof, are hereby continued in full force and effect, for the purposes contemplated by this act, and are especially enacted to like effect as if the same were incorporated herein at length: Provided, That in every case where an assessment for damages or an award shall have been returned by the appraisers, the company, upon paying into court the amount so assessed or awarded, may enter upon and take possession of the land covered thereby, irrespective of whether exceptions to said assessment or award shall be filed or not, and the subsequent proceedings shall not interfere with or affect such possession, but shall only affect the amount of compensation to be paid.

SEC. 6. That the construction of the track or siding herein provided for shall be begun within six months from the date of the passage of this act, and shall be completed within two years from said date, and pending such construction the said Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company is hereby authorized to maintain its present track connection with the United States Navy-Yard by means of a single track on K street and Canal street SE., either as at present located or as the same may hereafter be relocated, in whole or in part, with the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, but at the expiration of said two years said railroad company shall at its own expense remove said present track connection and restore the surface of the streets over which the same is laid, to the approval of said Commissioners.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBPŒNAS FOR WITNESSES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

The bill (S. 3526) to amend section 876 of the Revised Statutes, was considered as in Committee on the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That section 876 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended, so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 876. Subpœnas for witnesses who are required to attend a court of the United States in any district may run into any other district: Provided, That in civil causes the witnesses living out of the State or Territory in which the court is held do not live at a greater distance than 100 miles from the place of holding the same."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to know who reported the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON].

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. FULTON. I will say to the Senator that I reported the bill, and if he wishes I will explain it.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would explain how it changes existing law.

Mr. FULTON. It changes existing law in this respect, Mr. President, that under the existing law a subpœna in a civil cause can not be served upon a party outside of the district where the court is held at which he is to appear if his place of residence is over 100 miles from the place where the court is to be held, even though it be in the same State. This bill proposes to change the existing law, so that a subpœna may be served on him at any place in the State where the court is held without regard to the distance. But if he goes beyond the State, of course, the rule regarding distance still obtains.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the proposed amendment appears to be the same as the existing law, with the exception of the proviso. The original law, as well as the amendment, reads:

SEC. 876. Subpœnas for witnesses who are required to attend a court of the United States in any district may run into any other district.

But the proviso as it is proposed to be amended inserts the words "State or Territory" in place of "district." My recollection is that it has been held that the courts of the Territories are not United States courts, but legislative courts.

Mr. FULTON. I think the courts in the Territories have jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the courts of the Territories created by Congress have jurisdiction over cases in which the United States is a party and, indeed, I think any cases where the district and circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction——

Mr. FULTON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But they are not United States courts, as I understand.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator is correct about that. They are legislative courts. They are not constitutional courts, but it does not seem to me that that would affect the matter. The bill was originally drawn by ex-United States Attorney-General Griggs, but it has been changed somewhat. It had, as I recall, the words in regard to the Territories in the bill. I think the Senator from Utah is correct that there are no constitutional courts in the Territories. That is my recollection of the decision. But I do not think that would affect the matter any. I do not see any objection to leaving it in there.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out in line 20, on page 2 the words "or Territory."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHICAGO, PEORIA AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY.

The bill (S. 60) for the relief of the Chicago, Peoria and St. Louis Railway Company, of Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the Chicago, Peoria and St. Louis Railway Company of Illinois $2,835.45, being the amount of internal-revenue tax on certain high wines erroneously appropriated by the Navy Department at Indian Head.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

The bill (S. 2695) to amend the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," and the acts amendatory thereof, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation of the bill. I do not know that I have any objection to it, but I want to know what are the provisions of the section in the act of 1875. I have it not before me. The bill was reported by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. It is rather far-reaching in its effect. There is no discrimination as to the character of the defendant. A party might be a nominal defendant residing in some obscure part of the State, and suit might be brought against the real defendant, joined with the nominal defendant, and he be compelled to travel the entire length of the State for the purpose of defending the action. I think the bill should be explained.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator who reported the bill is not present.

Mr. HEYBURN. I observe that he is not present.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that the bill go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 4132) creating an additional land district in the State of South Dakota was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. GAMBLE. I trust objection will not be made to the bill. It is a matter of very great importance to that section of the State. There is a large region far removed from land-office facilities, and it is a matter of the highest importance to a large number of people in the northwestern part of the State. It is a short bill and is favorably recommended by the Department.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

WHITE EARTH BANDS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN MINNESOTA.

The bill (S. 4734) to provide for the transfer of a certain fund from "depredations upon public lands" to the credit of the White Earth bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer to the credit of the White Earth bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota the sum of $19,694.48, the proceeds of litigation with the Commonwealth Lumber Company.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT TOKYO, JAPAN.

The bill (S. 4639) to provide for the participation by the United States in an international exposition to be held at Tokyo, Japan, in 1912, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, after the word "and," in line 6, to strike out "the Secretary of State shall appoint;" and, in line 10, before the word "quarterly," to insert "at least," so as to read:

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized in accepting the invitation of the Imperial Japanese Government for the Government of the United States to participate in the Great National Exposition to be held in Tokyo from April 1 to October 31, 1912, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commissioner-general, who shall represent the United States at that exposition, and, under the general direction of the Secretary of State, shall make all needful rules and regulations in reference to contributions from the United States, and control the expenditures incident to and necessary for the proper installation and exhibit thereof, and the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint an assistant commissioner-general, who shall assist and act under the direction of the commissioner-general, and shall perform the duties of the commissioner-general in the case of his death, disability, or temporary absence; and a secretary, who shall act as disbursing agent and shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the commissioner-general and shall render his accounts at least quarterly to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two thousand five" and insert "three thousand six," so as to read:

The commissioners herein provided for shall serve during the entire calendar year 1912, and they shall be paid for such service $3,600 each, which payments shall be in full for all compensation and personal and traveling expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILLIP HAGUE, ADMINISTRATOR.

The bill (S. 2027) for the relief of Phillip Hague, administrator of the estate of Joseph Hague, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$13,740.66, for" and insert "$1,742.66, in full of all claims by reason of," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Phillip Hague, administrator of the estate of Joseph Hague, deceased, late of New York City, N. Y., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,742.66, in full of all claims by reason of loss, pilotage, towage, demurrage, and costs by him expended to estimate repairs of the brigantine Mary Margaret, by being run into by the United States transport steamer Belvidere in the harbor of Galveston, Tex., on September 19, 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. FULTON. The report is an extremely long one.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator can state it in substance it will be better.

Mr. FULTON. There is a good deal more embodied in the report than there should have been, as I observe in looking it over.

The facts in brief in regard to this claim are these: In 1865 the U. S. transport Belvidere was at the dock in Galveston and the brig Mary Margaret was lying at the same dock. The transport was ordered into quarantine and started to leave the dock. Conflicting orders were given, and instead of moving out properly she backed into the brig, committing damages which a board of survey composed of three officers of the Army found to aggregate $1,500.

The Department was ready to pay that sum, but the owners declined to receive it. So the matter hung along from time to time, and finally the Department held that by reason of the lapse of time it could not pay at all. Then the claimants came to Congress, presenting, as I recall it now, a claim for some $13,000. But the committee in investigating it finally concluded that the evidence was very clear that the damage of $1,500 was a legitimate claim. In addition to that we allowed $241.60 for towing the brig to some place to which she had to go—I do not recall now, but I think to some other wharf or place where she was to be repaired. We thought that was probably an item which should properly be allowed in addition to the $1,500 to cover the damages.

Mr. BACON. The claim, then, has been reduced from thirteen thousand to the amount stated in the bill?

Mr. FULTON. It has been reduced from something over thirteen thousand to $1,741.66.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNLAWFUL OCCUPANCY OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill (S. 3941) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands," approved February 25, 1885, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the section named so as to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That any person violating any of the provisions hereof, whether as owner, part owner, or agent, or who shall aid, abet, counsel, advise, or assist in any violation hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, for each offense.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF TIMBER ON ALLOTTED INDIAN LAND.

The bill (S. 4548) to provide for the sale of timber on allotted and unallotted Indian land, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with an amendment, on page 2, to strike out lines 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 in the following words:

Timber on unallotted lands of any reservation may also be sold under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds from such sales shall be used for the benefit of the Indians of the reservation in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out all after line 9 on page 2 of the bill. This is an unusual and extraordinary proposition and ought not to be enacted into law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after line 9, on page 2, in the following words:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to call on the Forest Service for assistance in carrying into effect the provisions hereof, and of any regulations he may prescribe hereunder, and also to determine what expenses shall be paid from the proceeds of the sale of the timber, whether on allotted or unallotted land.

Mr. GAMBLE. I reported the bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs. We have no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I merely want to say that I think the mixing of the jurisdiction of one Department with another would work badly, and there is no need of it. This is in rather a curious form:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to call on the Forest Service.

Of course the Forest Service is under the Agriculture Department. This is a mixing of authority which I do not think is advisable. I ask that the words be stricken out.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will state that the bill is a Department measure, having been drawn by the Department, and was introduced by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and this of course was desired by the Department.

Mr. TELLER. Under certain conditions the Department of the Interior may call upon the Department of Agriculture without any authority of law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the title be amended to conform to the character of the bill as passed. It will be observed that the title reads, "For the sale of timber on allotted and unallotted Indian land."

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; let the title be amended.

Mr. CARTER. The bill has been amended by striking out "unallotted." I therefore move to amend the title by striking out the words "and unallotted."

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the sale of timber on allotted Indian land, and for other purposes."

OFFICE OF CAPTAIN IN PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

The bill (S. 652) to create the office of captain in the Philippine Scouts was announced as the next business in order, and was read.

Mr. BACON. Does the bill come from the Military Affairs Committee or from the Committee on the Philippines?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BACON. As I understand, this is to create a sort of general office of the grade of captain, which will not be attached to any particular company. Is that the change that is proposed? Of course, we have had organizations of Philippine Scouts in the Philippine Islands for the last eight years. I simply ask for information. I do not know that there is any reasonable objection to that arrangement.

Mr. WARNER. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs having the bill in charge is not in the Chamber at present, and I suggest that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BACON. Not losing its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

SITE OF FORT LEE, PALISADES, NEW JERSEY.

The bill (S. 2669) providing for the acceptance of a donation of certain land situated at the Palisades, in the State of New Jersey, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to accept on behalf of the United States a donation of certain land situated at the Palisades, in the State of New Jersey, containing about 2¼ acres, which land is known as the site of Fort Lee and was used and occupied as a fortification by the Continental Army in the Revolutionary war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

The bill (S. 651) for the reimbursement of certain sums of money to certain enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to reimburse the enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts for certain sums of money intrusted by them to Lieut. Andrew Shea, Philippine Scouts, for safe-keeping and for transmission to their families in the Philippine Islands, which sums were embezzled by Shea and fraudulently converted to his own use, and appropriates $3,600 for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD THROUGH THREE TREE POINT MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 626) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and granting the same and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through the Three Tree Point Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Grays Harbor and Columbia River Railway Company, its successors and assigns, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. I understand that the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] desires to be present when this bill is considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Washington is in the Chamber.

Mr. PILES. I should like to have the bill passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar, at the request of the Senator from Washington.

COMPENSATION OF INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

The bill (S. 4066) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment in line 6, after the word "Boston," to strike out "and Philadelphia" and insert "Philadelphia, and San Francisco," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the maximum compensation of inspectors of customs not to exceed $6 per diem, at the ports of New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, and San Francisco and such other ports as he may designate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT HALF MOON BAY, CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 2483) to provide for the establishment of a life-saving station at Half Moon Bay, south of Point Montara and near Montara Reef, California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATERIAL AND EQUIPMENT FOR PANAMA CANAL.

The joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal was announced as next in order.

Mr. FRYE. Let the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Maine.

FORT PECK INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The bill (S. 208) for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all the surplus lands after allotment was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and before the reading was concluded——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Montana desire to have the pending bill completed?

Mr. DIXON. Yes; the reading is nearly completed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the bill a moment, but it seems to be one of very large scope. I should like to have some Senator in charge of it give a word of explanation about it, as to the amount of land involved, and so forth.

Mr. DIXON. I will state, in reply to the Senator from Georgia, that this is a bill which opens to allotment to Indians in severalty their lands on the Fort Peck Reservation in Montana, and provides for the sale of the surplus lands. Last summer a special agent of the Indian Department visited these Indians and held a conference with them, and this bill is the result of the agreement made by the inspector with the Indians at that time.

The original bill was prepared in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and afterwards referred to the Secretary of the Interior for his report. Sundry amendments proposed by the Secretary's office as to an irrigation scheme were referred back to the Committee on Indian Affairs and adopted. Those are the amendments which are offered to the bill as prepared originally by the Indian Office.

Ninety-five per cent of the male adult Indians signed the agreement. The Commissioner's office is favorable, the Secretary of the Interior has returned a favorable reply, and there is no objection to the measure anywhere along the line.

It embraces an area of country larger than the State of Delaware. There are 1,800,000 acres of land now occupied by less than 2,000 Indians. They are to be allotted land in accordance with their agreement, and the rest of the land will be thrown open to settlement. That is the bill.

Mr. BACON. I was struck by the fact that there seemed to be a very large irrigation programme laid out, and some $200,000, if I caught the reading correctly, are appropriated simply for surveying and the making of plans.

Mr. DIXON. The larger part of the appropriation is to reimburse for sections 16 and 36, which go to the public school fund in accordance with the universal legislation along that line. The appropriation of $100,000 to make the preliminary survey and to commence the work is to be reimbursable to the Government from the sale of the lands. So the Government will not be out one penny. It is to be reimbursed under the terms of the bill.

Mr. BACON. I understand that; I got that from the reading; but the thing that I had some little curiosity about was that the mere matter of plans would cost $100,000. I suppose it involves the surveys.

Mr. DIXON. The surveys and the commencement of the work, and the Treasury is to be reimbursed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as the Senator from Georgia says, this is an important bill. It is a local bill in many respects, and it deals with the question of the occupation of land by the Indians as well as the occupation of land by certain white people.

The Senator who has the bill in charge, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, has some amendments which he proposes, amendments which, I think, will improve the bill and will do away with the objection I would otherwise make to the bill. But on page 7 of the bill I find the following in the amendment of the committee:

> A right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the lands irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

That is not a question that we have anything to do with in Congress. It is purely a question of State regulation, and that clause must go out. Then it will be consistent with all the legislation we have made heretofore except in one case, where the courts in one State have ignored the provision. In the reclamation act there was a provision which said that the waters should be appurtenant. In one State at least the courts have held that that is a question for the State, and they have ignored it. I shall move to strike out lines 8, 9, 10, and 11.

Mr. DIXON. That amendment to the amendment will be agreed to when it is reached. After consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs I will submit an amendment. I will state that most of the amendments are merely to correct misprints in the bill. They were in the original amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs will be stated in their order.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 1, page 2, line 3, after the word "such," to insert "lands as may be irrigable therefrom, or necessary for irrigation works, and also," so as to make the section read:

> That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be surveyed all the lands embraced within the limits of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to cause an examination of the lands within such reservation to be made by the Reclamation Service and by experts of the Geological Survey, and if there be found any lands which it may be deemed practicable to bring under an irrigation project, or any lands bearing lignite coal, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to construct such irrigation projects and reserve such lands as may be irrigable therefrom, or necessary for irrigation works, and also coal lands as may be necessary to the construction and maintenance of any such projects.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 19, before the word "acres," to strike out "40" and insert "20," so as to read:

> SEC. 2. That as soon as all the lands embraced within the said Fort Peck Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause allotments of the same to be made under the provisions of the allotment laws of the United States to all persons having tribal rights or holding tribal relations, and who may rightfully belong on said reservation; that there shall be allotted to each member 320 acres of grazing lands and an additional allotment of not less than 2½ acres or more than 20 acres of timber land: Provided, That should it be determined as feasible, after examination, to irrigate any of said lands, the allotments may be 20 acres of irrigable land and 280 acres of additional land valuable only for grazing purposes, as the allottee may elect; and to pay the costs of the examinations provided for herein and for the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate lands which may be found susceptible of irrigation, there is appropriated $200,000, to be immediately available, the cost of such examination and systems to be reimbursed from the proceeds of sales of the lands within the said reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 3, after the word "reservation," to strike out the following:

> Provided further, That the Indians and settlers on the surplus lands, in the order named, shall have a preference right for one year from the date of the President's proclamation opening the reservation to settlement, to appropriate the waters of the reservation, which shall be filed on and appropriated under the laws of the State of Montana, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on behalf of the Indians taking irrigable allotments, and by the settlers under the same law. At the expiration of the one year aforesaid the irrigation systems constructed and to be constructed shall be operated under the laws of the State of Montana, and the title to such systems as may be constructed under this act, until otherwise provided by law, shall be in the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the said Indians, and he may sue and be sued in matters relating thereto: And provided further, That the ditches and canals of such irrigation system may be used, extended, or enlarged for the purpose of conveying water to any person, association, or corporation under and upon compliance with the provisions of the laws of the State of Montana: And provided further, That when any irrigation system constructed under authority of this act is in successful operation, the cost of operating it shall be equitably apportioned among the lands irrigated, and when the Indians have become self-supporting to the annual charge shall be added an amount sufficient to pay back into the Treasury the cost of the work done in their behalf within thirty years, suitable deductions being made for the amounts received from the disposal of the lands within the reservation aforesaid: Provided, That the right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

And to insert the following:

> Provided, however, That any land irrigable by any system constructed under the provisions of this section be disposed of subject to the following conditions: The entryman or owner shall, in addition to the payments required by section 8 of this act, be required to pay for a water right the proportionate cost of the construction of said system in not more than fifteen annual installments, as fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, with a view to the return of all moneys expended thereon, the same to be paid at the local land office, and the register and receiver shall be allowed the usual commissions on all moneys paid.
> The entryman of lands to be irrigated by said system shall, in addition to compliance with the homestead laws, reclaim at least one-half of the total irrigable area of his entry for agricultural purposes, and before receiving patent for the lands covered by his entry shall pay the charges apportioned against such tract, but the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to entries of lands under such irrigation system, nor shall any such lands be subject to mineral entry or location. No right to the use of water shall be disposed of for a tract exceeding 160 acres to any one person, and the Secretary of the Interior may limit the areas to be entered at not less than 40 nor more than 160 acres each.
> A failure to make any two payments when due shall render the entry and water-right application subject to cancellation, with the forfeiture of all rights under this act, as well as of any moneys paid thereon. The funds arising hereunder shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and be added to the proceeds derived from the sale of the lands. No right to the use of water for lands in private ownership shall be sold to any landowner unless he be an actual bona fide resident on such land or occupant thereof residing in the neighborhood of such land, and no such right shall permanently attach until all payments therefor are made.

All applicants for water rights under the systems constructed in pursuance of this act shall be required to pay such annual charges for operation and maintenance as shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the failure to pay such charges when due shall render the water-right application and the entry subject to cancellation, with the forfeiture of all rights under this act as well as of any moneys already paid thereon.

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to fix the time for the beginning of such payments and to provide such rules and regulations in regard thereto as he may deem proper. Upon the cancellation of any entry or water-right application, as herein provided, such lands or water rights may be disposed of under the terms of this act and at such price and on such conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, but not less than the cost originally fixed.

The land irrigable under the systems herein provided, which is owned by or has been allotted to Indians in severalty, shall be deemed to have a right to so much water as may be required to irrigate such lands without cost to the Indians so long as the title, legal or equitable, remains in said Indians; but any such lands leased for a longer term than three years shall bear their pro rata share of the cost of the operation and maintenance of the system under which it lies, and when the Indian title is extinguished such lands shall also bear their pro rata cost of operation and maintenance.

When the payments required by this act have been made for the major part of the lands irrigable under any system and subject to charges for construction thereof, the management and operation of such irrigation works shall pass to the owners of the lands irrigated thereby, to be maintained at their expense under such form of organization and under such rules and regulations as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the provisions hereof for the furnishing of water rights for the irrigation of Indian lands without cost except as provided for operation and maintenance.

A right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the lands irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

Mr. DIXON. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out all of line 1 after the word "tract," all of line 2, and all of line 3 to the word "nor," in the following words:

But the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to entries of lands under such irrigation system.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. Now let the amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7 in the amendment of the committee strike out lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, in the following words:

A right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the lands irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to direct the attention of the Senator from Montana to a feature in the amendment just read, which has been forcibly brought to notice as to the same class of settlers recently in our State. I notice that the payment extends in this case over a period of fifteen years. During that time this property will never be taxable or contribute anything to the maintenance of the State government, because the title will remain in the Government of the United States. I have just succeeded in having that difficulty in the State of Idaho adjusted, so that at the end of five years settlers may prove up; but I did not catch in the reading of this bill that there was any option given to the parties to prove up at the end of five years. I would suggest to the Senator from Montana the embarrassment that will arise from having in communities a large quantity of property which can not be taxed for school purposes or for any other purpose.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I will say, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, that to cover that phase of the case there is a provision in this bill that the settlers may commute their homestead entries and receive patents for their lands at the expiration of the commutation period of fourteen months, as now provided by the general land laws.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 3, on page 7, line 16, after the word "Indians," to insert:

and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks not less than 40 acres of said land at the present settlement of Poplar, and at such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlement.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior may reserve such lands as he may deem necessary for agency, school, and religious purposes, to remain reserved as long as needed, and as long as agency, school, or religious institutions are maintained thereon for the benefit of the Indians, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks not less than 40 acres of said land at the present settlement of Poplar, and at such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlement.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would say that that section is covered by a proposed amendment striking out and inserting. It was a mistake made by the printer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 8, section 4, line 3, before the word "persons," to strike out "three" and insert "five;" in line 6, after the word "follows," to strike out "one commissioner" and insert "two of said commissioners;" in line 7, after the word "be," to strike out "a person" and insert "persons;" in line 9, before the word "resident," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" in the same line, after the word "resident," to strike out "citizen" and insert "citizens;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That upon the completion of said allotments the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of five persons to inspect, classify, appraise, and value all of said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior, said commission to be constituted as follows: Two of said commissioners shall be persons holding tribal relations with said Indians, one representative of the Indian Bureau, and two resident citizens of the State of Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, section 5, line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five" and insert "eight," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That within thirty days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet at some point within the Fort Peck Reservation and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. Said commission is hereby empowered to select a clerk at a salary not to exceed $8 per day.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 9, line 5, after the word "appraisement," to strike out "of all;" in line 16, after the word "Indians," to insert "or by reservation or withdrawal under the provisions of this act," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That when said commission shall have completed the classification and appraisement of said lands, and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the lands shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead, desert-land, mineral, and town-site laws of the United States, except sections 16 and 36 of each township, or any part thereof, for which the State of Montana has not heretofore received indemnity lands under existing laws, which sections, or parts thereof, are hereby granted to the State of Montana for school purposes. And in case either of said sections, or parts thereof, is lost to the State by reason of allotment thereof to any Indian or Indians, or by reservation or withdrawal under the provisions of this act or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to select other unoccupied, unreserved, nonmineral lands within said reservation, not exceeding two sections in any one township, which selections must be made within the sixty days immediately prior to the date fixed by the President's proclamation opening the surplus lands to settlement: Provided, That the United States shall pay to the said Indians for the lands in said sections 16 and 36, so granted, or the lands within said reservation selected in lieu thereof, the sum of $1.25 per acre.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, section 9, line 25, before the word "equal," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to read:

SEC. 9. That entrymen under the desert-land law shall be required to pay one-fifth of the appraised value of the land in cash at the time of entry, and the remainder in five equal annual installments, as provided in homestead entries; but any such entryman shall be required to pay the full appraised value of the land on or before submission of final proof, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, section 10, line 18, after the word "reservation," to strike out "under" and insert "deemed practicable for;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That if, after the approval of the classification and appraisement, as provided herein, there shall be found lands within the limits of the reservation deemed practicable for irrigation projects deemed practicable under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, said lands shall be subject to withdrawal and be disposed of under the provisions of said act, and settlers shall pay, in addition to the cost of construction and maintenance provided therein, the appraised value as provided in this act, to the proper officers, to be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, on page 13, line 4, after the words "from the," to strike out "taking effect of this act" and insert "date of President's proclamation to entry;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That all lands hereby opened to settlement remaining undisposed of at the end of five years from the date of President's proclamation to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash at not less than $1.25 per acre, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and any lands remaining unsold ten years after said lands shall have been opened to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash, without regard to the minimum limit above stated: Provided, That not more than 640 acres shall be sold to any one person or company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, on page 13, line 22, after the words "Indians or," to strike out "reserved" and insert "withdrawn;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That the lands within said reservation however classified, shall, on and after sixty days from the date fixed by the President's proclamation opening said lands, be subject to exploration, location, and purchase under the general provisions of the United States mineral and coal land laws at not less than the price therein fixed and not less than the appraised value of the land, except that no mineral or coal exploration, location, or purchase shall be permitted upon any lands allotted to Indians or withdrawn under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, on page 14, line 10, after the words "SEC. 14," to strike out:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to set apart from said lands, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, such tracts for town-site purposes as in his opinion may be required for the future public interests, and he may cause any such reservations, or parts thereof, to be surveyed into blocks and lots of suitable size, and to be appraised and disposed of under such regulations as he may prescribe. The net proceeds derived from the sale of such lands shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians.

And to insert:

That such town sites shall be surveyed, appraised, and disposed of as provided in section 2381 of the United States Revised Statutes: Provided, That any person who, at the date when the appraisers commence their work upon the land, shall be an actual resident upon any one such lot and the owner of substantial and permanent improvements thereon, and who shall maintain his or her residence and improvements on such lot to the date of his or her application to enter, shall be entitled to enter, at any time prior to the day fixed for the public sale and at the appraised value thereof, such lot and any one additional lot of which he or she may also be in possession and upon which he or she may have substantial and permanent improvements: Provided further, That before making entry of any such lot or lots the applicant shall make proof, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which the land lies, of such residence, possession, and ownership of improvements, under such regulations as to time, notice, manner, and character of proofs as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That in making their appraisal of the lots so surveyed, it shall be the duty of the appraisers to ascertain the names of the residents upon and occupants of any such lots, the character and extent of the improvements thereon, and the name of the reputed owner thereof, and to report their findings in connection with their report of appraisal, which report of findings shall be taken as prima facie evidence of the facts therein set out. All such lots not so entered prior to the day fixed for the public sale shall be offered at public outcry, in their regular order, with the other unimproved and unoccupied lots. That no lot shall be sold for less than $10: And provided further, That said lots when surveyed, shall approximate 50 by 150 feet in size.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, on page 16, line 21, after the word "shall," to strike out "upon the date of the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the allotments of land authorized by this act" and insert "within three years after the completion of the irrigation systems to be constructed under the provisions of section 2 hereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. That after deducting the expenses of the commission of classification, appraisement, and sale of the lands, and such other incidental expenses as may necessarily be incurred, including the cost of survey of said lands, the balance realized from the proceeds of the sale of the lands in conformity with the provisions of this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of said Indian tribe, to draw 4 per cent per annum, the principal and interest to be expended from time to time by the Secretary of the Interior as he may deem advisable for the benefit of said Indians in their education and civilization, the construction and maintenance of irrigation ditches, should such be determined as feasible and beneficial to said allottees, and suitable per capita cash payments. The remainder of all funds deposited in the Treasury realized from such sale of lands herein authorized, together with the remainder of all other funds now placed to the credit of or that shall hereafter become due to said tribe of Indians, shall, within three years after the completion of the irrigation systems to be constructed under the provisions of section 2 hereof, be allotted in severalty to the members of the tribe, the persons entitled to share as members in such distribution to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, on page 17, line 5, after the word "appropriated," to insert "in addition to the amount appropriated in section 2," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in addition to the amount appropriated in section 2, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of Montana, and for lands reserved for agency and school purposes, at the rate of $1.25 per acre; also the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey, allot, classify, and appraise the lands in said reservation as provided herein, and also to defray the expense of the appraisement and survey of town sites, the latter sums to be reimbursable out of the funds arising from the sale of said lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, on page 7, line 11, strike out the period at the end of the committee amendment and insert:

All appropriations of the waters of the reservation shall be made under the provisions of the laws of the State of Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 16, after the word "Indians," it is proposed to strike out the committee amendment, as follows:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks not less than 40 acres of said land at the present settlement of Poplar, and at such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlement.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And also such of said lands adjacent to the right of way of the Great Northern Railway as are necessary for the use of the Great Northern Railway Company in the construction and maintenance of water reservoirs for use by said railway company in the operation of said line of railway; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed, when surveyed, to issue patents to said Great Northern Railway Company for the said lands embraced within said reservoir sites to the Great Northern Railway Company upon payment by said company of the sum of $2.50 per acre, the money so paid to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment from line 16 to 25, on page 7, was agreed to will be regarded as reconsidered, and the committee amendment disagreed to. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], which has been stated.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. Do I understand that the measure now pending was drawn in the Department?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, how does it come that there are so many amendments proposed to the bill?

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that the bill originally was framed in the Indian Office, after which it was referred to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval. These amendments, principally referring to the system of irrigation which the engineers want to construct there, are amendments suggested by the Office of the Secretary of the Interior to the bill as prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the Senator offered, or have the committee offered, any amendments not approved by the Department?

Mr. DIXON. None whatever, except the amendment relating to station tanks of the Great Northern Railway, which was overlooked when the bill was prepared.

Mr. CURTIS. I notice in that amendment that there is a provision that this land shall be conveyed to the railroad exclusively for the use mentioned in the amendment, which is for water tanks.

Mr. DIXON. That is the purpose of the amendment, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no limit in the right or the use?

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, these amendments were accepted by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Kansas that probably only an acre or two of land would be embraced. However, I will move to amend the language by inserting after the word "patents" the words "exclusively for the purposes aforesaid."

Mr. CURTIS. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Where does the Senator from Minnesota desire to have inserted the amendment which he has proposed?

Mr. CLAPP. After the word "patents" in the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "patents," in the amendment, it is proposed to insert the words "exclusively for the purposes aforesaid," so as to read:

When surveyed, to issue patents exclusively for the purposes aforesaid to said Great Northern Railway Company for the said lands, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 14, on page 14, line 10, after the words "SEC. 14," it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes, and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks, not less than 40 acres of said land at the present settlement of Poplar, and at such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the language contained in the amendment on page 6, line 10, where it reads:

As the Secretary of the Interior may determine, but not less than the cost originally fixed.

That leaves to the Secretary of the Interior to fix the price at anything above that sum. I move to insert in line 10, after the words "less," the words "nor more," so as to read:

But not less nor more than the cost originally fixed.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection on the part of the committee to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment, which he proposes to amend, was agreed to be reconsidered. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Colorado now proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, on page 6, line 10, after the words "not less," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting "nor more," so as to read:

Upon the cancellation of any entry or water-right application, as herein provided, such lands or water rights may be disposed of under the terms of this act and at such price and on such conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, but not less nor more than the cost originally fixed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question. I notice in the first section of the bill there is this language:

And if there be found any lands which it may be deemed practicable to bring under an irrigation project, or any lands bearing lignite coal, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to construct such irrigation projects and reserve such lands as may be irrigable therefrom, or necessary for irrigation works, and also coal lands as may be necessary to the construction and maintenance of any such projects.

The question to my mind—I must confess I am not familiar with the bill; it was impossible to follow the reading very closely, and it has been equally impossible to examine it since on account of its length—the question which occurred to my mind was whether the only reservation of coal lands is to be the reservation such "as may be necessary in the construction and maintenance of any such projects."

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. For instance, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, if it should be found that there are extensive coal deposits in Montana, is it the design of this bill that these lands shall be disposed of in the same manner as lands in which there are no coal deposits, except so far as they may be requisite, or the proceeds of which, I suppose, may be requisite, for use in the construction and maintenance of irrigation works?

Mr. DIXON. No. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that that section merely provides for this condition of affairs: Some parts of the reservation are underlaid with lignite coal. The Missouri River flows along the southern boundary of the reservation, and there is a vast area of Missouri River bottoms that the reclamation engineers think can only be irrigated by a pumping station. At the city of Williston, N. Dak., just 40 miles east of these lands, they constructed such a pumping station for irrigation last year, and they reserved two sections of lignite coal lands where the engines were situated in order to secure the power to pump the water. The provision giving the Secretary power to reserve such coal lands as may be necessary in the construction and maintenance of such irrigation projects merely gives him the right to reserve such lignite coal lands for use as fuel to make the power for pumping the water. At the Williston, N. Dak., station I think they reserved two sections of lignite lands for that purpose. That is all that is contemplated by that section of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I understand that; I understand, of course, that the purpose of that section is to reserve such of the coal lands as may be needed in the construction and maintenance of irrigation works; but what I desire to know is this: Suppose that, in addition to that, there are large areas in which this coal is to be found, is it the design that they shall be disposed of in the same manner and at the same price as common lands upon which there is no coal?

Mr. DIXON. Oh, no; they are to be disposed of under the general provisions of the public-land laws of the United States. The provision has no reference to coal lands other than those which are to be reserved for pumping purposes.

Mr. BACON. Well, I am not very familiar with the public-land laws of the country. Does the Senator refer to the public-land laws with reference to coal lands?

Mr. DIXON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. The provisions of this bill will put coal lands in this reservation under the same control and restrictions as those which are now provided by law for coal lands situated on other public lands of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. The same as on other public lands of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment with the purpose of having the formal committee amendments acted upon to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I suggest—and the suggestion applies more to this side of the Chamber than to the other—that I presume the Senate would be full immediately if it were understood in the committee rooms that this bill was being taken up for amendment, and, if it be agreeable to the Senator from Rhode Island, I suggest that he say that to-morrow he will ask that the bill be taken up for amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. My present purpose is only to have the formal amendments of the committee agreed to, but no contested amendments, and with the understanding that the bill shall be open to amendment hereafter in every respect.

Mr. BAILEY. And that it will not be necessary now, of course, to offer amendments which individual Senators may desire to offer.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly not. My only purpose is to have the formal amendments reported by the committee adopted to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection myself, Mr. President, to that course being pursued.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no purpose——

Mr. BAILEY. I think probably there are none of the committee amendments that will provoke any discussion at all, certainly no serious discussion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was, on page 1, line 10, after the words "United States," to strike out:

The Comptroller of the Currency, if in his judgment business conditions demand such additional circulation and the condition of the association making the application warrants the issue, may approve such application, and shall determine the time of issue and shall fix the amount, within the limitations hereinafter imposed, of such additional circulating notes to be issued.

And insert:

The Comptroller of the Currency shall transmit immediately the application, with his recommendation, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, if in his judgment business conditions in the locality demand additional circulation, approve the same, and shall determine the time of issue and fix the amount, within the limitations hereinafter imposed, of the additional circulating notes to be issued. In order that the distribution of notes to be issued under the provisions of this act shall be made as equitable as practicable between the various sections of the country, the Secretary of the Treasury shall not approve applications from associations in any State in excess of the amount to which such State would be entitled of the additional notes herein authorized on the basis of the proportion which the unimpaired capital and surplus of the national banking associations in such State bears to the total amount of unimpaired capital and surplus of the national banking associations of the United States: Provided, however, That in case the applications from associations in any State shall not be equal to the amount which the associations of such State would be entitled to under this method of distribution, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, to meet an emergency, assign the amount not thus applied for to any applying association or associations in States in the same section of the country.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island to explain a matter which, it seems to me, might present a difficulty. I have no doubt that he has had it called to his attention and considered it, but I do not have the information. Near the bottom of page 2 there is a provision for the distribution of this currency to various States in accordance with the amount of the unimpaired capital of the national banking associations of each State, etc., in the proportion it shall bear to the entire unimpaired capital of the national banking associations of the United States. Then comes the following proviso:

Provided, however, That in case the applications from associations in any State shall not be equal to the amount which the associations of such State would be entitled to under this method of distribution, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, to meet an emergency, assign the amount not thus applied for to any applying association or associations in States in the same section of the country.

It has occurred to me in reading the bill over that this provision might be a source of trouble in case of a financial flurry. Take, for instance, the last flurry that we had in October. These flurries usually start in some particular section of the country. Ordinarily they start in New York before any financial panic reaches the western part of the country. I think we all know that within five days before the 28th of October last no bank west of the Mississippi River would have thought of making a request for any additional circulation, and yet previous to that time the banks of other sections of the country might have asked for additional circulation. Under the terms of this bill, could not the Secretary of the Treasury have said two or three weeks before the emergency came that, there being no request from certain other States, therefore all might be assigned to some particular State or to a certain section of the country?

It seems to me that that contingency might arise. I do not know that it is a dangerous one. I suppose the committee thought of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Nebraska will read the concluding words of the section he will see that the States must be in the same section of the country. In other words, Nebraska's quota could not be assigned to New York. Nebraska's quota or some portion of it might be assigned to Iowa if Nebraska did not ask for it. The States must be in the same section of the country. The committee were of the opinion that that was about as definitely as it would be wise to make the distribution. If there was a demand in New York and no demand in New Jersey or in Connecticut, and an emergency existed, the Secretary of the Treasury would have a right to assign some portion of the quota of New Jersey or of Connecticut to New York, but not to Ohio, not to Illinois, and not to Nebraska.

Mr. BURKETT. I had read the last words of the provision, I will say to the Senator. The word "section" is not very definite. I used the very broad illustration, the territory west of the Mississippi. New York, New Jersey, and Delaware might be construed to be a "section." That section might be entitled to a certain proportion of all the additional currency that could be issued in the United States. A panic might start in New York City, and, large as is the proportion of the banking business in New York City, it might need all there was of the quota of that section, and thus deprive other localities.

I do not raise the question, of course, with the idea of offering any amendment, but I wanted to know if the committee has considered it?

Mr. ALDRICH. We gave the matter very careful consideration, and in our opinion it is properly guarded by the language used.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was on page 3, section 1, line 9, after the words "amount to," to strike out "75 per cent of the market value, as fixed by the Treasurer of the United States, of the bonds so deposited" and insert:

Seventy-five per cent of the market value of any railroad bonds and 90 per cent of the market value of any other bonds so deposited, such market value to be ascertained and determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

So as to read:

Whenever after receiving notice of such approval any such association shall deposit with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States such of the bonds described in section 2 of this act as shall be approved in character and amount by the Treasurer of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, it shall be entitled to receive, upon the order of the Comptroller of the Currency, circulating notes in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to 75 per cent of the market value of any railroad bonds and 90 per cent of the market value of any other bonds so deposited, such market value to be ascertained and determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, such additional circulating notes to be used, held, and treated in the same way as circulating notes of national banking associations heretofore issued and secured by a deposit of United States bonds, and shall be subject to all the provisions of law affecting such notes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I have had some inquiry as to whether the term "railroad bonds" in this connection includes the bonds of railroads other than steam roads. In our section of the country we have growing up a very interesting system of long-distance interurban electric railroads. There is one which is over 140 miles long. I have received an inquiry from those people whether this provision is intended to include their securities.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say that the amendment on the fifth page covers the interrogatory of the Senator from Iowa, and we have not reached that. It was my purpose to pass it over this morning, the committee themselves having under consideration an amendment to that particular provision. But this particular clause applies only to the percentages of advances.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, this statement in the RECORD would be apt to mislead some one who was searching for what we are trying to do and who was endeavoring to ascertain our intent from the RECORD. There is no manner of doubt that this bill excludes interurban railroad bonds, and, so far as I am concerned, I want them excluded. Indeed, I want to exclude all railroad bonds. But the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who was so efficient in helping to pass the recent amendment to the interstate-commerce law, will recall that the jurisdiction of the Government was limited to those carriers who conduct their business by rail—or partly by rail and partly by water—by steam railroads. I simply put this in the RECORD so that it will not be hereafter supposed by anybody that we did not know what we were doing or that we had done something that we had not intended to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not so sure the Senator from Texas, who is accustomed to be very accurate, is quite accurate in this matter. As I understand, the Interstate Commerce Commission has practically taken jurisdiction of the street railways of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAILEY. If so, it must be under some law relating to the District of Columbia, over which we exercise exclusive jurisdiction, and not under its general authority.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not so understand it. I understand that under the rate law, which was passed during the last Congress, the Interstate Commerce Commission has notified these railroad companies that they must comply with certain conditions which they will impose, on the ground that those railroads run beyond the District of Columbia into the adjoining States, and hence they come under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I have been so informed; and if that be so, I think we ought to be extremely careful in the phraseology of this bill, because I think it would be a great misfortune to have the bonds of railroad corporations of that kind included. I have been disposed to agree with the Senator from Texas that we go perhaps a little too far in including the bonds of steam railroads, but we certainly ought to be extremely careful not to let these interurban roads and street railroads, such as there are in the District of Columbia, be included in the bill. I think it is a matter which ought to be inquired into very carefully before the bill is finally passed upon.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure that Congress never had in contemplation when it passed that act that under it the Interstate Commerce Commission should burden itself with regulating the fares and the practices of the street railroads of this city, or even the street railroads that in many other instances cross State lines; but if it be true that the Interstate Commerce Commission has assumed that jurisdiction, then the next step will be to require the companies to report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. And when they do report they will bring themselves within this provision. It has been some little time since I examined that act as we passed it; but it seems to me the phraseology of it was such as to confine it not only to railroads, but to steam railroads. Still, however, I can easily understand how a body eager for more jurisdiction might insist that they were railroads, the same as those that are operated by steam.

If there has been any such order entered by the Commission, or if the Commission has asserted any such power, then I think probably the committee has not sufficiently guarded this question. As great a convenience as these interurban railroads are, and as welcome as they are to every community, I think they have not yet been tried sufficiently and they have not demonstrated both their earning capacity and their permanent value enough to have their securities accepted as the basis of our currency. Like the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], I have had some inquiries about it, and at least one of those inquiries came from some gentleman whose efforts to construct and operate such a railway I heartily applaud and sincerely wish success, but I would not be willing to see their securities accepted as a basis for this currency, because if the steam railroads determine to do it they can operate so as to reduce enormously the earning capacity of these interurban roads.

It may be the steam railroads will attempt, as they have done in New England, to buy the interurban roads and operate them for the passenger service and operate the steam roads for the freight service. I am not perfectly sure but that that would be a very successful conclusion for them all to reach. The interurban service for reasonable distances is more comfortable, or at least it is freer from many objections than is steam railroad travel, and where the two systems serve the same territory I am not perfectly certain that in time it will not go to the point that one will be used entirely for the passenger travel and the other for the freight traffic; and that will come about whether the railroads undertake to buy the other roads or not.

My own opinion is that the steam railroads ought not to be permitted to buy the electric roads, because they are plainly parallel and competing so far as the passenger traffic is concerned. If it shall happen, as it probably will, that the electric railroads become the main arteries of travel for people who want to go short distances, then in time probably their securities will be as well established in the market as the securities of steam railroads are now, but until that time does come surely we ought not to make a provision of doubtful wisdom still more doubtful by adding to the general description of railroad bonds the bonds of these new and, as we must all concede, yet experimental enterprises known as trolley railroads.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Texas, but there are several decisions in the States holding that the word "railroads" includes the electric railways in the State, without specifically naming them.

Mr. BAILEY. I am aware there are decisions of that kind, but I think that with the lawmaker, as with the average man when he talks about railroads, he does not have in contemplation either street railroads or trolley railroads.

Mr. RAYNER. I want to say to the Senator from Texas that I entirely agree with him. I am opposed to putting in railroad bonds at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad to know we have the concurrence of the Senator from Maryland on that point. The other side are going to put them in this bill.

Mr. RAYNER. I understand that.

Mr. BAILEY. Those who have the majority and the power that the majority gives are going to put them in, and if they are going in the bill I want them guarded as much as possible.

I do not expect this bill to be as good as it would be if we on this side could make it, but I am anxious to make it as good as it is possible to be made by the majority on the other side. I think the proceedings of the committee will show that the Democrats on the committee made no factious opposition. They sought no delay. They were ready to proceed. If they could not make the bill as good as it ought to be—and that could not be expected, as we were in the minority—our purpose was to make it as good as possible, so that if at last we could not vote for it—and that of course has to be settled by each man for himself, because it is not a party question and ought not to be made a party question—we should have helped to the best of our ability to improve it. What we could not get out we sought to improve. Not being able to get the railroad-bond provision out of it, I want to make it as safe as possible.

While I am on my feet and on that subject I venture to express the belief that this railroad-bond provision is too narrow if a provision for railroad bonds is to be made in the bill. If you want merely security, and if you are going to ignore the objection which most of us feel to basing our currency upon the bonds of these quasi-public corporations; if you reject that principle and provide for it, then all you want is ample security, security of tested and demonstrated value.

Now, there are millions of railroad bonds in this country which are not only good security, but good enough for the most prudent business man and those charged with the management of estates to invest their trust funds in, which would be excluded by the narrow provisions of this bill; and without suggesting and without intending to suggest that there was any sectional consideration, because I do not believe that influenced a single member of the committee, yet it is true that under the provisions of this bill there are but two railroads that traverse the South and serve the Southern people whose securities could be accepted—the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and the Illinois Central, the latter not being in its full sense a southern property, beginning as it does in the city of Chicago, chartered as it was by the great State of Illinois, and serving other sections besides our own. But so far as I have been able to examine it and to ascertain the facts up to this time the Illinois Central and the Louisville and Nashville railroads are the only two southern roads whose bonds could be accepted under this provision. I sincerely hope that the chairman of the committee and the majority of the committee, if they intend to allow railroad bonds to be used at all, will consent to an amendment that will at least permit the transportation companies of our southern and southwestern country to share whatever benefits may be derived from a provision of that kind.

But, Mr. President, I did not take the floor to discuss that question. I took the floor merely to answer as best I could the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and to express the hope that if there is any doubt about the acceptance of trolley-line railroad bonds in this bill, that doubt will be entirely removed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the provision describing railroad securities to be accepted under the provisions of this act is found on the fifth page of the bill, and I stated when I reported the bill to the Senate that the committee had under consideration modifications of that section. At the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Texas, as the Senator from Texas will remember, that matter was passed over with the understanding that we would, in committee, take up the question of the final description of railroad bonds to be received, and that later we would report such an amended provision for the consideration of the Senate.

I intended, when these provisions on the fifth page were reached, to ask that they be passed over, with the understanding that the committee would at a subsequent day, before the bill passed from the consideration of the Senate, propose certain amendments. The amendment now under consideration simply provides as to the percentage to be advanced on the different classes of securities.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a practical question with reference to the amendment on page 3, to which attention is being invited. Lines 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 read as follows:

> Seventy-five per cent of the market value of any railroad bonds and 90 per cent of the market value of any other bonds so deposited, such market value to be ascertained and determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

What I desire to know from the Senator in charge of the bill is, as a practical question, how the Secretary of the Treasury will arrive, or is supposed to arrive, at this market value? Will he take the valuation upon the stock exchange, or how will it be determined? I should like to have a practical idea how, in the opinion of the chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury will arrive at this market value.

Mr. ALDRICH. I take it for granted the Secretary of the Treasury will use all the available means at his command to ascertain the market value. For instance, take the first mortgage bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad. They are quoted every day and many times a day on all the great exchanges of the country. The market value is easily ascertainable for almost all the railroad bonds that are for sale, especially of the classes which we have indicated in this bill. I think there is no practical difficulty in the Secretary ascertaining the value.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to one point in connection with this matter. I am not so much disturbed about how the Secretary of the Treasury will ascertain the market value of the bonds as I am about another proposition. It seems to me we are establishing in these lines a new basis. If I understand it properly, heretofore the par value has always been taken; and in these lines we base the issue upon the market value. I understand, of course, that on bonds other than Government bonds you can not rely so surely on the par value always as regulating the amount of circulating notes that can be safely issued. But it does occur to me, as I read the provision, that there ought to be added to those three lines somewhere a limitation that in no event shall the issue be greater than 75 per cent or 90 per cent, as the case may be, of the par value of the bonds.

I take it these bonds come within the clause on the next page—State, city, town, county, municipality, district, and so forth. Now, suppose one of those bonds had a market value of 120. Ninety per cent would be 10 per cent off. The bank could issue notes against those bonds to the extent of 108. We would be in rather an anomalous condition, it seems to me, having guaranteed the payment of currency to the amount of 108, if those bonds should happen to come due in our hands with a par value of only 100.

While we may have to take the market value as the basis on which to issue circulation, it ought never to be issued, in excess of whatever limit we apply, on the par value. While I have not an amendment prepared now, I think before the bill is disposed of—I understand it will be open to amendment—I think there should be an amendment of the character I have indicated, and if I can draw one to suit me I think I will offer an amendment to that section.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, for information, an amendment which I will later offer to the pending bill.

Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. SCOTT, AND OTHERS. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin be read. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The SECRETARY. After the word "act," in line 25, on page 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That no mortgage bonds of any railroad company shall be accepted as security for any circulating notes provided for in this act unless the fair value and cost of reproduction of the physical property of such railroad shall have been previously ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified to the Secretary of the Treasury as hereinafter provided; And provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall investigate and ascertain the fair value and cost of reproduction of the physical property used for the convenience of the public of every railroad engaged in interstate commerce as defined in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906. For the purpose of such an investigation the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as may be necessary. Such investigation shall be commenced not later than June 1, 1908, and shall be prosecuted with diligence and thoroughness and the results thereof reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session. Such valuation shall show the value of the property of every railroad as a whole and the value of its property in each of the several States or Territories or the District of Columbia. Every such railroad shall furnish to the Commission from time to time, and as the Commission may require, maps, profiles, contracts, reports of engineers, and other documents, records, and papers, or copies of any or all of the same, in aid of such investigation and determination of the value of the property of said railroad, and every such railroad is required to cooperate with the Commission in the work of the valuation of its property in such further particulars and to such extent as the Commission may direct. The Commission shall thereafter in like manner keep itself informed of all extensions and improvements or other changes in the conditions of the property of said railroads and ascertain the fair value thereof and from time to time, as may be required for the regulation of railways and their rates and services, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, or for the purpose of determining the value of any railroad bonds as security for circulating notes provided for by this act, revise and correct its valuation of railway property. To enable the Commission to make such changes and corrections in its valuation, every railroad engaged in interstate commerce, as defined in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, is required to report currently to the Commission and as the Commission may require all improvements and changes in its property and to file with the Commission copies of all contracts for such improvements at the time the same are executed.

Whenever the Commission shall have completed the valuation of the property of any railroad, and before said valuation shall become final, the Commission shall give notice by registered letter to the company or companies owning or operating said railroad, stating the valuation placed upon the several lines of road and classes of property of said company used by it for the convenience of the public, and shall allow the company or companies twenty days in which to file a protest of the same to the Commission. If no protest is filed within twenty days, said valuation shall become final.

If notice of contest is filed by any railroad, the Commission shall fix a time for hearing the same, and shall proceed as promptly as may be to hear and consider any matter relative and material thereto presented by such railroad in support of its protest so filed as aforesaid. If after hearing any contest of such valuation under the provisions of this act the Commission is of the opinion that its valuation is incorrect, it shall make such changes as shall make the same a fair valuation of such physical property, and shall issue an order making such corrected valuation final. All final valuations by the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the fair value of the railroad property in all proceedings under this act and under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906. Upon a written request therefor, the Commission shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury its final valuation of any railroad when the same shall have been determined.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment having been read at the desk, it will of course be printed in the RECORD, not as offered at this time, but printed.

In the same way I submit another amendment and ask that it be read. It is a necessary amendment with the one first offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lines 11 and 12, page 3, strike out the words "seventy-five per cent of the market value of any railroad bonds" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Seventy-five per cent of the par value of any railroad bonds, but not more than 75 per cent of the value of the physical property upon which such bonds are secured, such value to be ascertained and determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I was about to make the suggestion a few minutes ago which was made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] with reference to the par value of these bonds, or rather I was about to make the inquiry of the Senator from Rhode Island in charge of the bill whether under this valuation more than 75 per cent of the par value of the railroads could be issued, or more than 90 per cent of the par value of State and municipal bonds, etc. The fact is, I started to interrupt the Senator from Rhode Island while he was on the floor to ask him whether in his judgment this could be done.

I wish to ask another question while I am on the floor, and that is whether under the rules of the Senate an amendment to an amendment of the committee can now be offered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Then I offer this amendment——

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, it was my purpose to have these formal amendments of the committee first acted upon and then have the bill printed as amended with the understanding, by unanimous consent, that amendments could be offered to the text of the bill as amended as though it were the original text of the bill, so that amendments can come into any portion of the bill at any time. I think that is probably the method which would be most convenient for Senators, it being my purpose that amendments of any character shall be offered to any provision of the bill at any time.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I do not wish to obstruct the mode of procedure that has been mapped out by the Senator in charge of the bill with reference to the amendments of the committee, but I will call the Senator's attention to the amendment I was about to offer. On the suggestion made by the Senator, I will withhold the amendment at this time, with the understanding, if that is the rule of the Senate, that afterwards an amendment to this amendment——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will be in order.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Will be in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MCLAURIN. This is the amendment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would state that the Senator may offer his amendment and have it printed and it will lie on the table to be offered to the bill at the proper time.

Mr. MCLAURIN. On the suggestion of the President I will pursue that course. I should like, though, to read the amendment I have. It is to insert after the word "Treasury," in line 15, the following, to wit:

Such valuation not to be in any event more than the par value of such bonds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I desire to give notice of an amendment, on page 5, after the word "earnings," in line 9, to strike out the words:

And which has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly and continuously on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than five years previous to the deposit of the bonds.

And to insert instead thereof:

And which has paid regularly and continuously for five years next preceding the deposit of its bonds the interest due on all its bonds.

I will state briefly the object of this amendment. It will be seen that the text of the bill requires that bonds offered as security for the currency to be issued shall be of a railroad which regularly and continuously paid on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than five years previous to the deposit of its bonds not less than 4 per cent. In issuing the currency it is not necessary nor may it be wise to look to what they pay on stock. The question is as to the validity and value of the bonds. I think it would be sufficiently secured, if we are to have railroad bonds as a basis of currency, by the assurance of its having paid the interest on its bonds for a period of five years.

I will further explain the amendment when it comes up, if necessary.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was impossible for me to hear the amendment suggested by the Senator from Virginia, and I will ask that it may be read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 9——

Mr. ALDRICH. That has not yet been reached, I will say, but I should like to have the amendment read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. I will state the amendment. It requires bonds of a railroad "which has paid regularly and continuously for five years next preceding the deposit of its bonds the interest due on all its bonds," having no regard to whether it has paid interest on stock or not.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia, if it suits his pleasure, that that amendment be referred to the Committee on Finance, that it may take it into consideration in connection with the other amendments to the clause.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I will ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why the words "market value" are used instead of the words "actual value." I can see a good reason, to my mind, why we should use the words "actual value" instead of "market value." The market value may change materially from one month to another. The market value of all these securities has changed very materially in the last two or three months. The word "actual" has a meaning which gives greater stability to the matter of the value rather than the words "the market value" of the securities.

Mr. President, I can see one very strong reason against the use of the words "market value." We will take the bonds of any one of the greater railways which have paid, we will say, a net income of $6,000,000 annually upon $100,000,000 of bonds. Everyone would agree that those bonds were worth their face value. Under manipulation or under great pressure it might be possible that they would be raised above their par value. Then, if the bonds became due, as many of them might become due, in periods of great prosperity, such as we have had in the last two or three years, on the supposition that prosperous conditions would continue indefinitely as they had been continuing, they would bond the same property for $150,000,000 or $175,000,000. The great amount of property interest that is back of those valuations might hold them up for a time, at least until the bonds were disposed of, so that bonds representing only $100,000,000 or $125,000,000 of actual property might be sold for par or even above par, when $150,000,000 or $175,000,000 of bonds were issued upon the same property.

It seems to me that the word "actual" there would answer every possible purpose. It would give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to determine not what the bonds were sold for from day to day, but to go back over a period of years and see what interest those bonds paid and what the railway paid over and above the interest of its bonds in dividends upon the stock.

That is the only true basis of value. The value of any property is what that property will bring in as an income over a large number of years, and not what it may be sold for to-day under one condition and sold for to-morrow under another condition.

It seems to me that the Secretary of the Treasury should not only have that privilege, but it ought to be his duty to investigate carefully what those bonds are earning year in and year out for a definite number of years, rather than what they may be sold for to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the Senator a question right on that point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask the Senator if he does not think that what a thing, whether farm lands or bonds of railroads, or horses, brings in the open market in the rough and ready contest between men who are dealing in that sort of property is about as good barometer of what the actual value of that thing as you can express in the English language?

you can express it in the English language?

Mr. McCUMBER. My own observation and my own experience are exactly the opposite of that. I will take the farm lands of the country to-day, for instance. In my section of the country they have increased from three times to five times their value in the last six or seven years. Now, that same farm property as an income producer produces no more to-day than it did five or six years ago upon one-third of the value.

Under the great wealth that has been secured in the past few years, under the methods of speculation in these most prosperous times, our farm lands have run up at least 50 to 60 per cent more than the real values, and the result is that at the present valuations of farm lands in all the northwestern part of the country they could not possibly pay an income upon the investment.

If, instead of that, we were to determine the valuation of the farm not by what it sold for, but by the net income from it for the last fifteen years, we would then have a proper basis of valuation, and the one true basis of valuation, in my opinion.

I assume, Mr. President, that money in this country on the average is worth about 6 per cent. An industrial plant, therefore, that has paid $6,000 net for eight or ten years may be safely said to be worth $100,000. If it has paid only 6 per cent and there are bonds against it to $150,000, though those bonds to-day or to-morrow or for the last two or three years sell at par, they are not worth par as an investment-bearing income.

As I said before, I think the only proper way to arrive at the value of any property is to determine what income it will bring, not only in good times but under poor conditions in the country.

Mr. BURKETT. I will ask the Senator, then, if in his State loan companies make loans on the actual value he speaks about, or do they make them in proportion to what the land is worth to-day in the market?

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not care about going into the question of land matters over the United States under the great advance in valuations. I will say to the Senator, however, that in the case of most of the farm lands in the country that have been sold from two to three times above their old values mortgages have been given back. It has not represented always cash; sometimes partial cash, and sometimes a mortgage for the balance. I know they will not pay a good income upon the mortgages that are now against them, based upon these excessive values.

Mr. BURKETT. I did not mean to say anything on this point, because what I said a moment ago, when I made the remarks on what the percentage should be based upon, has always occurred to me as the proper rule—that is, it should not be in excess of the par value. I think, perhaps, I expressed my ideas then. I have never perceived that there is so much difference between the actual value and the market value as the Senator has just indicated. It seems to me, as I said, that the best barometer of the actual value of a thing is what it will bring in the open market, where the man who has the money to invest figures it up from every economical standpoint and sets its value on it. The very land that the Senator speaks of in his State as having trebled in value is to-day being valued for sale, and for loan, and for obligation of every sort, not upon the hypothetical basis he suggests of actual values, but upon the real market value. As I said in the question I put to him, it seems to me that the words "market value" are about the best index of what the value of a thing is that you can get words in the English language to express.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I wish to state what is, I think, the trouble about the issuance of notes to banks on railroad bonds. The market value and the real value, the actual value of property, are the same. The value of property is what it will bring in the market. There is a distinction between the worth of anything and its value, but there is no distinction between the actual value and the market value.

Now, the trouble with these railroad bonds and the issuance of notes to banks or to anybody else on railroad bonds is that their market value may be one thing one day and another thing another day, and their market value may be a great deal in excess of the actual worth, and the Government may thereby lose; or, as the Senator from Rhode Island said yesterday in presenting the bill, the Government could not lose, because it would have a lien upon all the assets of the bank. Then the depositors would have to lose, because their deposits would be a part of the assets of the bank and would go to make up the amount that the Government is to obtain after exhausting these securities.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the provisions in lines 16, 17, and 18, on page 5:

May with such approval at any time require the deposit of additional securities, or require any association to change the character of the securities already on deposit.

That was intended to cover the precise case he is talking about. So if there was variation in the price of these securities the Secretary might require an additional deposit or a change of securities, if he so desired.

Mr. McLAURIN. I had read that provision, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would say to the Senator from Mississippi that in my observation there never was any such change as he suggested in first-class securities, such as are called for by the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. But the Senator recognizes the fact that there is a difference between the value and the worth of property.

Mr. ALDRICH. That depends. It depends upon what kind of property or bonds is under consideration.

Mr. McLAURIN. There may be a difference?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; there might be a difference, possibly owing to panic conditions or otherwise, but there is no difference that I can ascertain, in my judgment, between the actual value and the market value of bonds of this character.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not myself see any difference between the actual value and the market value of bonds, but I can see a very great difference between the actual and market value, which I conceive to be identical, and the actual worth of the bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. The actual worth of the bonds would depend, I imagine, upon the interest of the party who was deciding that question. The owner of the property would say that the bonds were worth a much larger sum perhaps than the Senator from Mississippi would say, judging from the small surroundings of the bonds, the income, etc. There might be a wide difference of opinion about the worth of the bonds between the Senator from Mississippi and myself, for instance.

Mr. McLAURIN. I should say that the worth of a bond would depend a great deal upon the amount of the railroad property back of the bonds.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] is entirely right in contending that in no event should the bank be permitted to issue currency beyond the 75 per cent of the par value of the railroad bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, as I understood the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. It is the Senator's amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understood the Senator's amendment, I shall not object to it. I think it a very proper amendment. It is not, however, I think, just what the Senator from Texas thinks it was.

Mr. BAILEY. I examined it, and the purpose of it, as I read it, is that in no event shall a bank be permitted to issue currency beyond 75 per cent of the par value.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I think not.

Mr. BAILEY. And if they should fall below the par value, then they must keep it up to 75 per cent of the market value. I will read to the Senator from Rhode Island from a very carefully prepared proposition on this very subject, which would have covered the very case. I say "carefully prepared," of course, in a jocular way, because it is one I prepared myself; but I sought to require that they should always keep the cash value up to 90 per cent and in no case exceed 90 per cent of the par value. I phrased it this way:

Provided, That in no case shall the deposits made under this act exceed 90 per cent of the par value of said securities: And provided further, That the cash value of said securities shall at all times exceed the amount deposited by 10 per cent.

That operated both ways. If the securities should be worth 125, they could still only deposit 90 per cent. This substitute of mine deals only with the municipal and State securities, and they could still issue only 80 per cent of the par value; but if after they were deposited or before they were deposited, they should depreciate to 90 per cent of their par value, then they could use them only to the extent of 90 per cent of their cash value. In other words, they might go as high as they pleased, the Government would only treat them as worth 100 cents on the dollar; but if they should diminish in their value, then the Government would recognize the action of the market and conform to it, and require the banks to keep on deposit at least securities of a cash value of 10 per cent above the amount deposited by the Government.

Of course, this bill providing for the issue of money by the banks, instead of the deposit of money by the Government, would be subject to the same limitation. I had no doubt the Senator from Rhode Island would accept the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, and I think he will find, upon examining the Senator's amendment, that it was intended to do precisely what I suggest, to prevent more than the par value under any circumstance and to preserve the cash value when that is below the par value.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas this question: If he makes it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury at all times to have bonds of such value as he has stated, would not the result be that in the time of a panic, when the bank was short of funds, it would be required to go out and buy additional bonds to make its circulation good?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that might be a hardship on the bank, but we were not drafting this bill for the benefit of the banks. If the bank gets from the Government the currency which under this bill it might get, or the deposits which it might get under the substitute, and if the securities it deposited in either event, to secure the notes in one and the deposits in the other, should depreciate, surely the Senator from California would not regard it as a hardship on the banks to ask them to make their collateral good? The bank would demand that of the Senator from California; the bank would demand that of any customer whose note it might hold; indeed, the usual form of the note which we all have to sign when we borrow money from a bank is that they can call for additional security whenever they please, and, if we do not answer their call, they can sell our collateral—some of them without notice, and all of them upon proper notice. Surely the Senator from California can not consider it a hardship to apply the same rule to the bank that the bank applies to all its customers.

Mr. FLINT. I would answer the Senator from Texas by stating that back of the bonds is the bank itself. If at the time money is sought for, at the time when the bank is struggling to pay its depositors, it is required to go out and buy additional securities to make its circulation good, the very purpose of the act would be destroyed. As I understand, the purpose of this bill is, to a certain extent, to help the banks as well as the people, but if we provide such a drastic measure the effect will be whenever additional circulation is needed that the banks will have to go out and get additional securities to make good their circulation, and will only receive 75 or 90 per cent of the value of the securities in currency, and instead of being a benefit it would be a great injury.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is sincerely to be hoped, and it is certain that if the expectation of those who framed this legislation is realized, there will be no serious decline in the value of securities or other kinds of property when the power of this act is once invoked; in other words, when you begin to supply the country with $500,000,000 of fresh money to take the place of the money which has been hoarded, you at once arrest the tendency to further lack of confidence, and I think it reasonably certain the lowest value of these securities will have been reached before they are used.

Of course, I recognize that there may come an unprecedented catastrophe in which $500,000,000 of new money would not be sufficient, and I am frank to say that, if I had the power, I would make the amount a thousand million dollars instead of $500,000,000. None of it would be used until the requirements of the country became imperative, because no bank could pay 6 per cent until the emergency arose.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I wish to call his attention to one fact in regard to this bill. Under our national banking laws now, as I understand, national banking associations are authorized to issue circulation to an amount equal to the par value of the United States bonds deposited by them. They can issue circulation to an amount equal to 25, 40, 50, or 100 per cent of the value of their capital. The national banking laws as they exist to-day leave largely to the discretion of the national banking associations the amount of national-bank notes that shall be placed in circulation. I have always thought that that was a mistake. I believe that we ought to have required circulation equal to their capital stock.

Take the bill of the majority of the committee. It does not go even as far as the national banking laws at the present time go. Under the provisions of this bill, as reported by the majority of the committee, the national banking associations which are now in existence, or that may be organized hereafter, can, if they desire to do so, issue this $500,000,000 currency, half that amount, a fourth of it, or none of it. In other words, we leave it entirely to the discretion of the national banking associations of the country to say whether or not any of these notes shall be issued. I ask the Senator from Texas, Are we not leaving entirely to the national banking associations of this country how much paper money shall be in circulation, how many national-bank notes shall be issued and placed in circulation as money, and is it not a very dangerous discretionary power to exist anywhere except with the Government?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia and myself are in thorough agreement on that question, and in the substitute which I have drawn and which at the proper time I shall offer I have not left it to the discretion of the banks whether the necessary currency shall be issued. My substitute commands the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit it with the banks. Of course it may be said that they can not be compelled to receive the deposit and give the security, but I answer that, if they refuse, they would be forever deprived of their privilege of acting as depositaries of public funds.

The Senator from Georgia has stated correctly that, under the law at present, the national banks may issue circulation equal to 25 per cent of their paid-up capital stock, or may issue notes equal to 100 per cent of their paid-up capital stock; but, as a matter of fact, the banks have only issued upon an average about 60 per cent of the amount which they could issue. The reason they have not done so, in my judgment, is the high price of the bonds. There are probably outstanding now in United States bonds a few thousand dollars less than the total capitalization of the national banks, and therefore the national banks could not under the law issue the full $901,000,000 which they would have been entitled to issue on the 3d day of December, that, as I now recall, being the full amount of their capital stock.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if it is not a fact that there is an abundance of United States bonds to justify Congress in requiring the banks to issue 50 per cent of their capital stock in currency, or to provide that no national bank shall avail itself of the provisions of this act which has not issued 50 per cent of its capital stock in currency, and thereby shown its good faith in trying to supply the need of the country for money?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I think undoubtedly that is true, and I believe this bill requires that they shall have taken out not less than 50 per cent. I know there was some discussion at one time in the committee on the proposition to require them to take out even more than that, and it was the Senator from Florida who insisted upon that course.

Mr. President, I now call attention to the fact that there is an insufficient supply of United States bonds to enable the banks to issue all the currency which under the law they might issue for the purpose of emphasizing my belief that Congress must finally establish a currency system not based upon the public debt of the United States. I belong to that old school who do not believe that a public debt is a public blessing. I belong to that older and, as I believe, wiser school, that believes that it is the duty of a government, as it is of an individual, to discharge its interest-bearing obligations as rapidly as possible. When we do reach the time when the bonded debt has been discharged, we are face to face with either a governmental issue of money or a bank issue based upon the assets of the banks.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas another question. I have seen the statement made in the public press that it would be impossible to carry out the theory suggested by the Senator from Texas, for the reason that if the $500,000,000 of Treasury notes were issued redeemable in gold it would be impossible to redeem them, and in the event of a run on the Treasury that it would be too great a strain on the gold reserve. I will ask the Senator this: If I understand the bill which the majority of the committee reports, it provides for the banks issuing $500,000,000 of national-bank notes. If $500,000,000 of national-bank notes should be issued under the provisions of this bill, is it not true that all those notes would be redeemable in gold? In other words, the Government will guarantee the redemption of these additional notes; these additional bank notes are directly redeemable in Treasury notes, and the Treasury notes are redeemable in gold. How could there be any greater strain on the gold reserve by the issuing of Treasury notes than there would be by the issuing of national-bank notes under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, so far as it concerns the stock of gold in the Treasury, it is precisely the same whether the banks issue the $500,000,000 or the Government issues it. The notes issued under the provisions of this bill are redeemable in lawful money, and lawful money is redeemable in gold. In other words, the man holding a national-bank note can demand that the Government redeem it, and the Senator from Rhode Island has provided in this bill that upon demand the Government must redeem the note. He demands the redemption of his note. It is redeemed in lawful money, which, we will say in this instance, is a note of the United States, and he takes a note of the United States and then demands gold across the Treasury counter. If a conspiracy should be organized against the gold reserve of the Treasury, the $346,000,000 of United States notes now in circulation are ample to enable men to accomplish the purpose of that conspiracy. In other words, with $346,000,000 of Treasury notes, commonly known as "greenbacks," now outstanding, a raid upon the Treasury gold stock could be made just as successfully as it could with this additional $500,000,000.

Senators—well, I will not say Senators, because I will not assume that Senators make arguments except according to their convictions—but the people outside of the Senate who characterize my proposition as the recrudescence of greenbackism are either ignorant or worse, if, indeed, anything can be worse than ignorance in the discussion of a public question. Every dollar of the $500,000,000 which the bill I shall offer as a substitute proposes to issue is redeemable in coin, and there is only gold coin provided for now as redemption money. For a man to talk about our proposal as an effort to revive the old doctrine of the greenback party, which was not for redeemable money at all, as everybody knows, but which was for an irredeemable money, is absurd. Those good but misguided people simply proposed to write upon the face of a piece of paper the legend, "This is a dollar," and compel everybody to take it as a dollar. We propose no such absurdity as that now. We propose to issue the note of the Government supported by the pledge of the Government to redeem it. What do you gentlemen propose to issue? The note of the bank sustained and supported by the promise of the Government to redeem it if the bank does not. We propose as good a note as you do, as good a note as can be offered to the public.

Mr. President, at some future time I shall discuss this question, but I want to say to the Senator from Georgia now, and to all the Senators, that if I had the power there would be but one kind of paper money in this country by the 1st of next January. I would retire the bank notes and substitute for them the Government notes. I would retire the gold certificates and substitute for them the notes of the United States, and I would retire them without the least disturbance. I would simply provide that hereafter whenever a gold certificate should come into the Treasury in the ordinary course of collection it should be canceled and that in its place a Treasury note should be issued. Then I would take the gold now held in the Treasury against that gold certificate, and I would transfer that gold over to the general gold redemption fund, now held in the Treasury for the redemption of greenbacks, and in twelve months I would thus retire the gold certificates. I would have a gold reserve fund of approximately $900,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States, and surely every man will agree that with a Treasury reserve of $900,000,000 in gold we could easily carry two and a half billion of United States notes.

Our present system is a patchwork, and nothing but the unshaken confidence of the American people in the American Government has ever made it tolerable. A man goes into one place and he gets one kind of paper money; he goes into another place and gets another kind of paper money. There ought to be only one kind of paper money. Every dollar of it, of course, ought to be as good as any other dollar, but our whole financial system is one of shreds and patches, put together from time to time as the exigencies of the country have required. We ought to have a harmonious system, and there ought to be no notes in circulation in these United States except those issued by the sovereign power of the General Government and sustained by its taxing and other powers.

The time will come, and it is not very far distant, when the people of the United States will retire the greenbacks and have only a bank circulation or the people of the United States will retire the bank notes and have only a Government circulation. As between the two I would have small hesitation. I believe the right to coin and issue money is a sovereign power, and I would no more vote to authorize the banks to issue our paper money than I would vote to lease the mints to a mining corporation and authorize them to coin our metallic money. That issue we will meet. We are not prepared, probably, to settle it now, and I am very well content that it must not be settled now, because it probably can not be wisely settled at this time. If we had to deal with it and dispose of it now, I very much fear that the banks would be clothed with this great and sovereign power, and I also very much fear that the Government would be compelled to become the guarantor of the bank notes.

When that time does come, if it shall come, after a thorough and intelligent discussion of the question, I have no doubt, Mr. President, what the judgment of the American people will be. When I say the judgment of the American people, I do not use that phrase as demagogues sometimes use it. I do not mean that the unthinking people who lack substance and intelligence will determine it; but I believe that the brain, the enterprise, the thrift, and the patriotism of the American people will ordain a system under which the American Government shall resume its great and sovereign function of coining and issuing money.

I want to say to the Senator from California that the statement he made a moment ago is a dangerous one to be made to the public at this time. He reminds the people that when these notes are issued, if these securities should depreciate, and if the Government should be left without ample collateral to protect these notes, the note holder has a prior lien upon the assets of the bank. That is a dangerous doctrine. That is the doctrine which makes asset currency so dangerous.

Mr. FLINT rose.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will let me finish—if in a time of financial storm and stress, when men lack confidence in their bankers and in their banks, they are to be told that the men who hold the bank notes have a prior lien upon the deposits of the bank, you will intensify the depositors' distrust and you will compel a run upon the banks, actuated by the haste of men to withdraw what belongs to them before it is made the subject of a prior lien.

That is the folly of the men who talk about asset currency. The moment there was a breath of suspicion to disturb the financial and industrial and commercial repose of the country, the banks most subject to distrust would be the first ones to issue notes; and when a bank, already the subject of its depositors' suspicion, began to increase its liabilities, it would also begin to increase the fear of its depositors. You can not make a depositor leave his money in a bank whose solvency is open to question while he sees that bank issuing paper, every dollar of which is a prior lien against his deposit account. The inevitable effect of an asset currency, or any currency which gives the holder of a note a superior lien on the deposits of the bank, will be to intensify the depositor's distrust, because it reduces the depositor's security.

I was brought up in an old-fashioned way to believe that when a man's solvency was under question, the way to remove the question was for him to reduce his liabilities; but the modern doctrine is: Whenever there is any doubt about your ability to pay what you owe, increase your debts, and that will remove the suspicion. That is the inherent vice of an asset currency, and it would be a grave mistake to pass this bill and leave in the public mind any thought that the funds held back by the bank to satisfy its depositors might be required by the note holder for the redemption of its notes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely desire to give notice that at the proper time I shall offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I ask may be read and printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "taxes," in line 5, page 5, section 2, it is proposed to insert:

Bonds of the government of the Philippine Islands, bonds of the city of Manila, and bonds of railroads in the Philippine Islands, the principal or interest of which has been guaranteed by the government of the Philippine Islands in accordance with authority conferred by the laws of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment and for convenience of reference, I desire to have two statements printed in the RECORD. I do not care to have them read. They are statements of the bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the statements referred to by him be printed in the RECORD. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

EXHIBIT A.

Bonds authorized and issued for the Philippines.

Title of bond.	Authorized by Congress.	Amount of issue.	Date issued.	Amount bid.	Payable.	Due.
Friar land bonds	Act of July 1, 1902	$7,000,000	Jan. 11,1904	107.577	1914	1934
Philippine public improvement bonds:
First issue	Act of Feb. 6, 1905	2,500,000	Mar. 1,1905	109.06	1915	1935
Second issue	do	1,000,000	Feb. 1,1906	108.3747	1916	1936
Manila sewer and water:
First issue	Act of July 1, 1902, as amended by act of Feb. 6, 1905	1,000,000	June 1,1905	109.5625	1915	1935
Second issue	do	2,000,000	Jan. 2,1907	109.1 for $15,000 109 for $30,000 105.777 for $1,955,000	1917	1937

To meet the interest and principal on these bonds ample sinking funds have been provided, and the bonds are now held on the market, notwithstanding the present depression, at prices well above those for which they were originally sold, as indicated above under the heading "Amount bid."

EXHIBIT B.

With reference to the "bonds of railways, the principal of which or the interest upon which has been guaranteed by the government of the Philippine Islands," it is well to state that the only bonds which have been issued under this clause are the bonds of the Philippine Railway Company, to which a concession has been granted under the terms of an act of Congress approved February 6, 1905.

Under this the total liability which the Philippine government may incur shall not at any time exceed $1,200,000. This of course fixes the maximum liability of the government. As a matter of fact, under the concessions heretofore granted, it will not exceed $600,000. It may be well to state here that the revenues of the Philippine government exceeded the total expenditures in the past fiscal year by $2,900,000.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether or not, in the deliberations of his committee, the question of including Territorial bonds as a security was considered? I will state to him before he replies that my inquiry is induced by the fact that I have had letters from bankers, who state that they hold Territorial bonds which are good security and which they desire to have included among those bonds to be recognized as legitimate security. I do not know whether or not the committee have considered the subject, and I thought, before offering the amendment, I would make the inquiry.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, as I have already stated, the committee have under consideration at the present time certain amendments to the provision in regard to the security to be received. The question was before the committee at one time, but there was a difference of opinion as to whether Territorial bonds of some classes should be received. The committee have not yet decided that question; but I hope at a later day we may present provisions that will be satisfactory to Senators upon that point.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I understand it is unnecessary that I should offer any formal amendment if the committee has the matter under consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the pending amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I understood the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island to be that he desired at this time to have action upon the formal amendments in order that the bill might be printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. In that form?

Mr. BACON. In that form, leaving the provisions open in all particulars to amendments. I suppose the necessary conclusion from that is that, in permitting the amendments to be acted upon and adopted, we are in no manner to be considered as having agreed to any one of them, but to having simply allowed it to be passed in that way in order that the Senator may get the bill printed in the shape in which he desires it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendments, if agreed to——

Mr. BACON. Would be open to amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Would stand as amended unless further amended.

Mr. BACON. I understand that fully, but as the amendments are now to be put to a vote, and as some of us may not agree to all of these amendments, I thought it well that the statement should be made that they are now being agreed to simply pro forma.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to have a little fuller understanding in regard to the status of these amendments. Under the rules that govern us, if they are agreed to as we are now proceeding to consider committee amendments, it would seem to me that they would not be open to consideration again in Committee of the Whole, but that any attempt to amend them would have to be considered in the Senate after the bill had been reported by the Committee of the Whole. If that is not true, then I am mistaken as to the rules that govern the consideration of a bill before this body.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho is correct under the rules of the Senate, but the Senator from Rhode Island asked a modification of the rules to the effect that the amendments, although agreed to in the manner now proposed, shall be open to further amendment in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was the statement which I sought to bring forth, that further amendments might be made in Committee of the Whole. It had not been so stated, so far as I had heard. The statement had merely been that it would be subject to further amendment. Of course that would be true in the Senate, but the understanding should be distinct that the bill should be treated in Committee of the Whole as though these amendments had not been considered at this time or acted upon.

I am unable to see that anything is to be gained by acting upon these amendments at this time, because it merely means that we are going to act twice upon the same question, which is repugnant to all rules of legislation. We have rules governing us as to the consideration of committee amendments; that when they are once adopted upon the reading of the bill for their consideration they can not be further considered in Committee of the Whole. Now, we are undertaking—by unanimous consent, perhaps, although unanimous consent has not been asked in the regular way—to pass upon these amendments in the Committee of the Whole, and then with the tacit understanding—that is perhaps as far as it goes—that the action of to-day shall be treated as a nullity.

I see nothing to be gained by that course. It seems to me we might just as well consider the committee amendments as we do on other occasions in regard to other bills, as we reach them, and when we have acted upon them under the rules which govern this body in its legislation, let that action stand until the bill comes before the Senate reported from the Committee of the Whole. It may result in some confusion or misunderstanding if we vote as we were proceeding to do, at the instance of the Chair, upon this amendment at this time and adopt it, making a record which shall govern us. I say frankly that it has been my intention to suggest some amendments and to differ with the committee in some slight particulars in regard to these proposed amendments; and it seems to me we are as ready now as we will be after the bill is again printed to take up these amendments. It seems to me we should proceed with a thorough understanding and entirely within parliamentary rules in passing these amendments.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, probably I failed to state clearly what my purpose was. I certainly must have, from the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I stated that I desired, if that was the pleasure of the Senate, to have the Senate consider and dispose of the formal amendments made by the committee. If there is any Senator who objects to any one of those amendments, I certainly shall be very glad to have it passed over. My purpose was to have the formal amendments reported by the committee, which were not objected to, made now, so that the bill might be printed in that form and the whole scheme of the committee be before the Senate in a straightforward form. I then intended, as I stated before, to ask the Senate to have that bill considered as the original text, subject to amendment in Committee of the Whole and everywhere else, as it would have been if it had been reported as a substitute instead of in the form in which it was presented.

If anybody objects to any one of these amendments, I am quite willing that it shall be passed over and considered at a subsequent time. If the Senator from Idaho, or any other Senator, is not ready to vote upon any of these amendments offered by the committee, and he believes that the convenience of the Senate would be better served by adopting some other plan, I have no objection. I have no purpose except to get at this question in the most expeditious way and in the way which will be most convenient to Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not certain that under the parliamentary law which governs this body it is possible to proceed as is suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island. His long experience in this body and his familiarity with parliamentary practice doubtless qualify him for expressing an opinion which should have more weight than any opinion I might entertain. But still it is necessary as we proceed in matters of this importance that even those of us least advised should understand exactly the situation which this bill occupies before this body.

Mr. President, I do not know that even by unanimous consent we can pass, or rather, in the language of the Senator, adopt, the amendments proposed by the committee and then again consider them as in Committee of the Whole. Perhaps no one would raise an objection, but it would make an unusual record in the consideration of a bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that it has been done many times in my experience in the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I have no doubt that it was done under a tacit understanding that the rules would be considered suspended for that purpose.

Mr. ALDRICH. All unanimous consents are suspensions of the rules to that extent.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Already some committee amendments have been read and passed rapidly which I desire shall be further considered before they are considered as having been adopted by this body.

The Senator from Rhode Island has used the term that these amendments of the committee be "adopted" at this reading. When an amendment is adopted, it is squarely within the rule which prohibits it from being further considered in Committee of the Whole. So we had better see that our record is straight. It is just as convenient to consider these amendments at this time as at another time, and the mere fact of reprinting the bill is a matter of minor importance. The bill is now printed in very convenient form for consideration. The amendments of the committee are indicated by the character of type. I would not like to feel that these amendments, which have been read to-day and in a perfunctory way passed or said to have been adopted, were not open to further consideration in this body as in Committee of the Whole, because there are some of them to which I desire to give further consideration.

While I would not assume to advise the older Senators in charge of this bill as to the proper manner of proceeding, I would suggest that we must protect ourselves in the right to consider this bill with that deliberation and thoroughness which seems to us proper.

A statement came from the Senator from Rhode Island that the committee proposed suggesting further amendments to this bill. It seems to me that also is not warranted under parliamentary practice. The bill has been reported to the Senate by the committee, and the committee's connection with it has been determined; and unless the Senate should refer it back to the committee, the committee can not make further amendments. We should like to feel when we take it up for consideration that we are proceeding under the ordinary and accepted parliamentary rules of this body; that we have before us all that the committee has to report; and then when we reach an amendment proposed by the committee, we shall consider it.

The bill has been read the first time for the information of the Senate, and I for one desire that as each committee amendment is reached it shall either be passed over for further consideration or that it shall be considered, and not that it shall be announced by the President that it is adopted.

I for one do not desire that any amendment of the committee which has been read to-day shall be considered as adopted, or that the record shall show that it was adopted, until it has been discussed to the satisfaction of the members of the Senate. I make this statement that there may be no misunderstanding in the future.

I now ask that any order or statement that may have been made that any amendment has been adopted shall under the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island be taken as a mere formality, and that we may be entitled at this time or at any subsequent time during the consideration of this bill in the Committee of the Whole to discuss any amendment—those that have been passed to-day and those that have not been reached—because I desire when these amendments are reached to submit such views as I may have in regard to them.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the committee, with the exception of the amendment in lines 6, 7, and 8 on page 5, may be considered as adopted pro forma, with an understanding, by unanimous consent, that the bill shall then, in Committee of the Whole, as an original bill, be open to any amendment to any part of the bill; and then I will ask that the bill be printed with the amendments as made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island if, when he employs the term "adopted" in asking unanimous consent that the amendments, with the exception of the one in section 5, be considered as adopted, he uses it in its full parliamentary sense?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will use any word the Senator from Idaho, in his wisdom, thinks proper. I will say "accept;" that the amendments shall be accepted pro forma. I will make it apply to all amendments in the bill that have been "adopted" or otherwise, as the Senator may see fit. I have no desire to use any word that is obnoxious to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to reconsider the action of the Senate in adopting any committee amendment that has been read to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first put the request of the Senator from Rhode Island for unanimous consent. The Chair asks the Senator from Rhode Island kindly to restate his request.

Mr. ALDRICH. My request is that the amendments of the committee to the bill, with the exception of the amendment on page 5 with reference to the description of bonds to be accepted, be considered as accepted pro forma, with an understanding that the bill after that acceptance shall be open to amendment in Committee of the Whole as an original bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to inquire if that includes the amendment on page 11, to strike out?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing to except that also if the Senator from Texas desires it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do. I think that is an important amendment which the committee has made, and personally I should vote against the amendment. I do not desire to be understood as agreeing that that amendment shall be accepted.

Mr. ALDRICH. All right. I will except also the amendment at the top of page 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the amendments of the committee, excepting the amendment on page 5, lines 5, 6, 7, and 8, and the amendment on page 11, be accepted pro forma, and be open to future amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. In Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ALDRICH. In Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In Committee of the Whole, as though not agreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Under what rule of parliamentary law can we accept the amendments of the committee that have not been read in any other way than as they are ordinarily accepted under parliamentary law? What rule of this body authorizes us to accept amendments of the committee pro forma that have not been read?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will allow the bill to be read through, and then make the request. I am quite aware that the technical objection made by the Senator from Idaho is a good one, perhaps, and I will ask to have the bill read and then prefer the same request.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to be captious, certainly, in this matter. I only desire that no amendment shall be given any status that it would not have had the statement not been made that the amendment of the committee is accepted. I desire that the status of the committee amendments should remain exactly as it would have stood before this body had that statement not been made from the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw his request?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not. I am willing to have the Senator from Idaho object, if he desires. I do not withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho object to the request?

Mr. HEYBURN. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a matter of some little importance, as it affects what is the ordinary method of procedure in the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw the request, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. I will say that I am on the side of the Senator from Rhode Island, in order that he may not misunderstand what I propose to say.

The Senator from Rhode Island has proceeded in the way which is entirely usual in this body. In a large parliamentary assembly rigid adherence to parliamentary law is necessary, that the body may proceed with some degree of accuracy and intelligence in the consideration of measures; but in a small body like the Senate it is perfectly practicable to proceed in some generally understood and recognized and consented-to way which may not be strictly in accord with parliamentary law.

Senators will recall that in the consideration of all measures of importance here, where they are of any length, such, for instance, as appropriation bills or the rate bill upon which we were engaged in the last Congress, it has been the universal custom to proceed just as the Senator from Rhode Island proposed to proceed to-day; and the adoption of an amendment, with a full understanding that it does not preclude further amendment to that amendment, while in absolute violation of strict parliamentary law, is in accord with what will, in a small body like this, result in attaining the end in the easiest way.

Mr. President, the only reason why I mention the matter after the Senator from Rhode Island has withdrawn his request is that if the Senator from Idaho can make effectual an objection of this kind to the extent that what we have heretofore adopted as the usual procedure must hereafter be discarded, we will be reduced to great inconvenience if we are hereafter to adhere strictly to the rules of parliamentary law.

This is a body where the highest rule is the rule of consent, and most of the work of the Senate is done by consent; and where it is consented to that we shall adopt amendments with a view to having the bill put in its most convenient shape thereafter to be amended, in what way will anybody be prejudiced and in what way will any amendment to which a Senator objects be put in a position where he can not subsequently reach it by amendment as perfectly as it could be if we did proceed in the technical way that the Senator from Idaho now proposes.

I think, in order that we may hereafter do as we have done in the past, and that we may proceed with this bill and with future bills as we have done in the past, it is important that the Senate should adhere to the practice which it has heretofore adopted, of a convenient, easy way of disposing of measures in a small body like this.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would inquire for information whether or not under parliamentary law, an amendment of the committee having been adopted and passed by, the bill could be amended by reconsidering that amendment which had been adopted? Now, it is not sufficient to have the right to amend the bill as though it were originally in Committee of the Whole, but we want the right reserved to consider amendments of the committee. I desire to know whether or not it would be held that an amendment which attacked the entire amendment that had been adopted was an amendment within the reserved right suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island. That is a parliamentary inquiry which is not without some force. We want the full right, should our judgment dictate that we should exercise it, to resist the adoption of amendments of the committee; not to amend them, but to resist their adoption, and if we have waived that by sitting quietly by to-day while it is announced that an amendment of the committee is adopted, it is now time we knew it. This is the time to know it.

I am not inclined to invoke parliamentary law in its strictest sense. I have no purpose in doing so inimical to the consideration of this bill or the final result. I only desire that before these amendments proposed by the committee are adopted that they shall be considered and discussed and voted upon. Of course we would have a right to amend the bill in Committee of the Whole, but not, under the parliamentary law that governs us, should anyone see fit to invoke it, as though these amendments had not been adopted. We would not have a right to resist or attack the entire amendment of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. You would have in the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the Senate we would, but we prefer to reserve that right under the broader rule of the Committee of the Whole. Of course any opposition to the amendments or to the bill can be made in the Senate after the Committee of the Whole has reported it. But I want the discussion and the parliamentary right retained as fully as to every part of this bill as though no amendment of the committee had been adopted.

No more important measure will be before us. We have time enough to consider the amendments now, as much time as we will ever have, and we had better proceed slowly from the beginning of the bill, taking up the amendments as we reach them, and discuss them, and then after the amendments are disposed of we will discuss the bill as amended in Committee of the Whole and then again in the Senate under the more restricted rule that pertains to that body.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a motion before the Senate. However, I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not ask the Senator to yield to me. I will take the floor in my own right whenever the Senator from Idaho is through.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have moved a reconsideration of the votes by which committee amendments have been adopted. That motion is before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, three-quarters of the business of the Senate is done by unanimous consent, and that business can be at any time interrupted or delayed indefinitely by objections of Senators. The right to object, of course, is a sacred right in this body. I certainly have no disposition to try to do anything against the wishes of Senators upon this question. I am quite willing to have the Senate vote, if it sees fit, upon the question of reconsideration. None of the amendments already adopted is an amendment to which I think any Senator would object.

Mr. BACON. And no amendment has been adopted which under the unanimous-consent agreement asked for by the Senator from Rhode Island could not be reached by a motion to strike out.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. BACON. It is absolutely within the control of the Senate.

Mr. FULTON. I also understand that under the rules by which we were working an amendment may be offered to any of the amendments which have been accepted.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho, that the vote by which the amendment was heretofore agreed to be reconsidered.

The motion was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the pending amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, lines 9, 10, and 11, it is proposed to strike out "75 per cent of the market value, as fixed by the Treasurer of the United States, of the bonds so deposited," and insert:

Seventy-five per cent of the market value of any railroad bonds and 90 per cent of the market value of any other bonds so deposited, such market value to be ascertained and determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I understand that if we adopt this amendment of the committee we accept the provision including railroad bonds among those that may be deposited as a basis of circulation. I do not believe we are ready to adopt that as an amendment. The Senate having voted not to reconsider its action adopting the previous amendment, it seems to me quite important that at this time we consider the amendment before us. The amendment proposed by the committee is that circulation may be issued to the extent of 75 per cent of the market value of any railroad bonds and 90 per cent of the market value of any other bonds so deposited.

Mr. President, the market value of a number of railroad bonds which, under the rule stated in this bill, would be available, is as much as 20 above par. I have a list of some of the bonds that would be considered available for this purpose. For instance, the Central of New Jersey bonds were quoted on last Saturday at 126. That would be taken to be the market value of those bonds, because they bring that in the market. Is the Senate ready to adopt an amendment of the committee which says that circulation may be issued against those bonds at 126, on a basis of 75 per cent?

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I have an amendment to that amendment limiting the issuance to 75 per cent of the par value of the bonds, which, as stated by the Senator from Texas correctly, is intended to prohibit the issuance of more than 75 per cent upon the par value and less than 75 per cent of the par value if the actual worth of the bonds should be less than the par value. I am opposed to the issuance of bank notes upon any railroad bonds, but I understand that under the unanimous consent, which was asked by the Senator from Rhode Island, after the bill shall have been read as in Committee of the Whole, and after all these amendments shall have been adopted, if they shall be adopted, it will be in the power of the Senate, upon the motion of any member of the Senate, to strike out that whole amendment.

That was the unanimous-consent agreement which was requested by the Senator from Rhode Island, and, as I said. I think it would be better for us to give that unanimous consent until we get through the reading of the bill. Then, when we shall have gotten through with the reading of the bill and the formal adoption of the amendments, we can treat the bill, as suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, as if it were an original bill, with the permission of any Senator to move to strike out the whole provision or any other provision of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I understand that now to be the rule of action, established by unanimous consent. When I objected to unanimous consent I did not do it in a captious spirit or intend to delay the consideration of the bill or to interfere with the plan of procedure which had been outlined by the Senator from Rhode Island. In making the objection I intended to take advantage of the opportunity of determining exactly the status of the bill and the manner in which it was to be considered.

Mr. President, I called attention to this provision at this time because it contains in it a recognition, in the enumeraton of securities, of railroad bonds. Of course an amendment would be proper, striking out that portion of the amendment; in other words, an amendment to the amendment would be proper when the bill is being considered as in Committee of the Whole under the unanimous-consent agreement or the present agreement.

But it certainly is important at the beginning of the consideration of this bill that there shall be no uncertainty as to its status at any time. This is the second reading of the bill. It has a status given to it by the parliamentary law that governs us. While we may by unanimous consent proceed along other lines or under other rules than those established by the fundamental law which governs us, yet it is quite important that there should be no uncertainty as to the extent to which the unanimous consent is intended to apply.

I do not intend at this time to discuss the provision giving railroad bonds the status of Government bonds as a basis of circulation. I do expect at a future time to consider that question. I need hardly say that I am opposed to such a financial system, and I shall oppose the recognition of railroad bonds as a legitimate basis for the issuance of circulation guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the question whether railroad bonds shall be accepted under the provisions of this act comes up in the paragraph on the fifth page of the bill. If the Senator thinks it is involved here, I am quite willing to pass the amendment over with an idea that the provisions on the fifth page shall be considered first. I therefore ask that this amendment may be passed over for the accommodation of the Senator from Idaho.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the pending amendment, on page 3, be passed over. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 1, page 3, line 20, after the word "notes," to strike out the following:

Provided, That the amount of such additional circulating notes delivered at any time to any association shall not in any case exceed the limit fixed for such issue by the Comptroller of the Currency: And provided further.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 1, after the word "association," to insert "including notes;" and in line 2, after the word "bonds," to strike out "or otherwse" and insert "as now provided by law, and notes secured by other bonds as provided by this act;" so as to read:

Provided, That the total amount of circulating notes outstanding of any national banking association, including notes secured by United States bonds, as now provided by law, and notes secured by other bonds as provided by this act, shall not at any time exceed the amount of its unimpaired capital and surplus.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that amendment be passed over. That also carries with it the feature of the railroad bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon; it does not.

Mr. HEYBURN. It says "other bonds."

Mr. ALDRICH. Other bonds may be bonds of States or cities.

Mr. KEAN. "As provided by this act."

Mr. HEYBURN. This act provides for the issuance of circulation upon railroad bonds, and the term "other bonds," as I read it, is intended to distinguish bonds other than national bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. If railroad bonds are not provided in this act, it will not apply.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will not if they are not provided, but as the bill is reported of course it applies to them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 4, line 8, after the word "than," to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred," and in line 9, after the word "dollars," to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That all acts and orders of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Treasurer of the United States authorized by this section shall have the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

So as to read:

And provided further, That there shall not be outstanding at any time circulating notes issued under the provisions of this act to an amount of more than $500,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 4, line 14, after the word "Treasury," to strike out "may" and insert "shall;" in line 18, after the word "issued," to strike out "for municipal purposes;" in the same line, after the word "city," to insert "town;" in line 19, before the word "county," to strike out "or;" in the same line, after the word "county," to insert "other legally constituted municipality or district;" in line 20, after the word "existence," to strike out "as a city or county;" in line 21, after the word "of," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten;" in line 24, after the word "it," to strike out "and which has at such date more than 20,000 inhabitants as established by the last national census;" on page 5, line 2, after the word "net," to insert "funded;" in line 3, after the word "of," to strike out "the" and insert "its," and in the same line, after the word "property," to strike out "therein," so as to read:

That the Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall accept as security for the additional circulating notes provided for in the preceding section bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of any State of the United States, or any legally authorized bonds issued by any city, town, county, or other legally constituted municipality or district in the United States which has been in existence for a period of ten years, and which for a period of ten years previous to such deposit has not defaulted in the payment of any part of either principal or interest of any funded debt authorized to be contracted by it, and whose net funded indebtedness does not exceed 10 per cent of the valuation of its taxable property, to be ascertained by the last preceding valuation of property for the assessment of taxes.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether the language in line 19, "or other legally constituted municipality or district," would cover bonds issued by school districts, and was so intended?

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably they are covered by it. That was the intention of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, on page 5, line 6, after the word "company," to strike out "not including street railway bonds" and insert "which, in compliance with existing law, reports regularly to the Interstate Commerce Commission a statement of its condition and earnings, and," so as to read:

Or the first-mortgage bonds of any railroad company, which, in compliance with existing law, reports regularly to the Interstate Commerce Commission a statement of its condition and earnings, and which has paid dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly and continuously on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than five years previous to the deposit of the bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the sentence commencing with "or" after the semicolon in the fifth line down to the word "bonds" in the twelfth line may be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, page 5, line 13, after the word "Treasury," to strike out "may" and insert "shall;" in line 16, after the word "may," to insert "with such approval," and in line 19, after the word "deposit," to insert "It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain information with reference to the value and character of the municipal and railroad securities authorized to be accepted under the provisions of this section, and he shall from time to time furnish information to national banking associations as to such bonds as would be acceptable as security under the provisions of this act," so as to read:

The Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall accept, for the purposes of this act, securities herein enumerated in such proportions as he may from time to time determine, and he may with such approval at any time require the deposit of additional securities or require any association to change the character of the securities already on deposit. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain information with reference to the value and character of the municipal and railroad securities authorized to be accepted under the provisions of this section, and he shall from time to time furnish information to national banking associations as to such bonds as would be acceptable as security under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 5, line 26, after the word "That," to insert "the legal title of;" in the same line, after the word "bonds," to insert "whether coupon or registered;" and on page 6, line 4, after the word "them," to strike out "with a memorandum to that effect attached to or written or printed on each bond, and signed by the cashier or some other officer of the association making the deposit," and insert "under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury," so as to read:

That the legal title of all bonds, whether coupon or registered, deposited to secure circulating notes issued in accordance with the terms of this act shall be transferred to the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the association depositing them, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, on page 6, line 9, after the word "the," to strike out "Comptroller of the Currency, or by a clerk appointed by him for that purpose," and insert "Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States," so as to read:

A receipt shall be given to the association by the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, stating that such bond is held in trust for the association on whose behalf the transfer is made, and as security for the redemption and payment of any circulating notes that have been or may be delivered to such association.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, on page 6, line 20, after the word "sixty-seven," to insert "and sections 5224 to 5234, inclusive," so as to read:

The provisions of sections 5163, 5164, 5165, 5166, and 5167 and sections 5224 to 5234, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes, respecting United States bonds deposited to secure circulating notes shall, except as herein modified, be applicable to all bonds deposited under the terms of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 17, after the word "bonds," to insert "of the United States," so as to read:

And such associations having on deposit bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate higher than 2 per cent per annum shall pay a tax of one-half per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 9, at the end of the section, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to United States bonds called for redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to withdrawal of circulating notes in consequence thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 10, line 8, after the word "cashier," to strike out "Upon request of any national banking association the" and insert the word "The;" in line 9, after the word "currency" to insert "acting;" in line 11, after the word "shall," to insert "as soon as practicable;" in line 14, after the words "stock of," to strike out "such association" and insert "the national banking associations;" in line 17, before the word "association," to strike out "the" and insert "each," and in the same line, after the word "association," to strike out "making the request," so as to read:

The Comptroller of the Currency, acting under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall as soon as practicable cause to be prepared circulating notes in blank, registered and countersigned, as provided by law, to an amount equal to 50 per cent of the capital stock of the national banking associations; such notes to be deposited in the Treasury or in the subtreasury of the United States nearest the place of business of each association, and to be held for such association, subject to the order of the Comptroller of the Currency, for their delivery as provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 8, page 11, line 1, after the words "SEC. 8," to strike out "That national banking associations located outside of reserve or central reserve cities, which are now required by law to keep a reserve equal to 15 per centum of their deposited liabilities, shall hereafter hold at all times at least two-thirds of such reserve in lawful money. The," and in line 6, before the word "provisions," to insert "That the;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to the reserves of national banking associations, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that that amendment may be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 9, to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 9. That all acts and orders of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Treasurer of the United States authorized by this act shall have the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill as amended be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the bill as amended be printed. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to inquire if that means it is to be printed with these amendments merely appearing as amendments or as part of the original text?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it would be better to have them printed as a part of the original text.

Mr. BAILEY. I think so. That is what I was going to suggest.

Mr. ALDRICH. Leaving only the two amendments that have been reserved.

Mr. BAILEY. And printing them as amendments?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; printing those as amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 12, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 11, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REDUCTION OF SKILLED LABOR IN THE NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday, just before adjournment, a point of order was made to a resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was briefly argued. The Chair sustains the point of order, and it is proper, very briefly, to assign the reasons therefor.

The provision of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to state his reasons for the action referred to, presents a new aspect of a principle already settled. The House from its earliest history has exercised and cherished its prerogative of calling on the Executive for information and documents. In 1792, at the very beginning of the Government, the House decided that the Secretaries of the President's Cabinet should not be called personally to the floor of the House to give information, and concluded that written information should be furnished instead. From that time until this no Cabinet officer has given information on the floor of the House, although they have been frequently called before committees to testify, either voluntarily or by subpœna.

Resolutions calling for written information and for documents have in the later years of the House been given a privileged status, but the precedents show that this privilege has been confined within somewhat strict lines. It is allowable to call upon the head of a Department for a statement of facts within the knowledge of his Department, but whenever an attempt has been made to call for opinions or to direct the officer to make an investigation it has been held that these provisions destroy the privilege of the resolution of inquiry.

It is not necessary to cite here the precedents in these cases, as they are well known to the membership of the House.

The Chair is of the opinion that a call upon an executive officer for a statement of his reasons is likewise out of harmony with the principles governing the use of these resolutions. It would tend to create discussion and debate between the executive and legislative branch and would not assist in the orderly and proper transaction of the public business.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the last four words of the resolution, "and the reasons therefor." I understand that under the decision of the Chair the resolution would then become privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for present consideration of the resolution upon condition that the words "and the reasons therefor" be stricken out. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the committee amendments with the words indicated stricken out.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with and that the statement be read in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

On amendment numbered 26: To pay interest on judgment in favor of the Atlanta Machine Works against the United States.

J. A. TAWNEY,
E. B. VREELAND,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report of the conference committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I believe the Senate inserted an item of $75,000, or such a matter, for contingent expenses in the Senate. Is that one of the items agreed to?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is.

Mr. MANN. I know it is not customary for the House to interfere in such matters, but this is a very large deficiency. I think the House ought to know something in reference to it. A very grave abuse grew up, as it seemed to many Members in this body, about the contingent fund. What is the excuse for it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the facts in regard to the contingent appropriations for the Senate are these: Under the current law for the fiscal year 1908 Congress appropriated $100,000 for contingent expenses for the Senate, and for the House $50,000, and a deficiency for the remainder of this year of $25,000. So that the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House will be $75,000 for the current year, with a membership of 400, including Delegates and Resident Commissioners, while the Senate membership is 92. This additional deficiency makes the total appropriation for the current year on account of the contingent expenses of the Senate $175,000, or $100,000 greater than the contingent expenses of the House.

Your conferees asked for an explanation of this, and what has occasioned this enormous increase, but, as usual, we were unable to get any specific information; there was nothing said as to there being any great emergency or any unusual circumstances occurring during the year that necessitated this increase. They wanted it because they wanted it, and that is about the only answer that the conferees on the part of the House could elicit.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to inquire what the normal sum is in the Senate. This is apparently an abnormal sum.

Mr. TAWNEY. They have been receiving $100,000 and a deficiency of about $25,000 to $50,000 annually. The expenditures for contingent purposes in the Senate have always exceeded the contingent expenses in the House. That is the only explanation that I can give, Mr. Speaker. There is no question but what there is necessity for some inquiry into this matter, but it is an inquiry this House is powerless to make or initiate. This shows an enormous expenditure under the head of contingent expenses in the other branch of the legislative department of this Government.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether this House can not make it by declining to agree to an appropriation of that kind until the information is furnished?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, that experiment has been tried so frequently without any result except failure, that it was abandoned long before I came to the Committee on Appropriations. The House has been obliged ultimately to agree. To not do so would result only in delaying the final enactment of this law carrying these appropriations, the enactment of which is absolutely necessary on account of the urgent demand for some of these appropriations. They should become available at the earliest possible time, notably the Panama Canal deficiency.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to agree to the report.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to amendments Nos. 5, 11, and 26.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House do further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments indicated.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, a word of explanation. These three amendments are as follows: The first is a Senate amendment appropriating $1,875 for the payment of the services of Mr. BANKHEAD, formerly a Member of the House and now a member of the Senate, while he served as a member of the Inland Waterways Commission during the summer of 1906. The second amendment that I ask the House to further insist upon its disagreement to is No. 11, which authorizes the payment of the expenses incident to the prosecution of the Hyde-Benson case in the District of Columbia out of the general appropriation for judicial expenses. The third amendment, No. 26, is a Senate amendment proposing to pay interest on a claim upon which judgment was obtained, the interest allowed being the amount from a certain date to the date of the entry of the judgment, aggregating about $437. The last amendment, Mr. Speaker, No. 26, the House conferees declined to agree to for the reason that it is not, and never has been, the policy of the Government to pay interest on claims prior to the entry of judgment. This action was brought under the Tucker Act on a contract, alleging default on the part of the Government of the United States, and the plaintiffs in the action succeeded in establishing to the satisfaction of the court the fact of the default and the damages which were sustained by reason thereof, and judgment was allowed in the sum of $3,344, with legal interest from the date of the default down to the date of the rendition of the judgment. The matter as presented to the conferees was that the Attorney-General refused to certify the judgment to Congress as he is required to do by law for an appropriation. Instead of certifying, as we were told, the full amount of the judgment, including the interest and costs, the Attorney-General certified only the principal carried in the judgment, omitting to certify the amount for interest or the amount for costs. Upon inquiry of the Attorney-General I received a copy of the letter which was presented by Senator CLAY to the Senate, the Senator who offered the amendment in the Senate, a letter addressed to the attorney of the plaintiffs in the case, in which letter are cited the decisions of the Supreme Court on the question; but here is the important information which the conferees did not have when in conference, and which prompts me now to ask that the House further insist upon its disagreement. The Acting Attorney-General at that time, Mr. H. M. Hoyt, says:

> I might add that when the judgment in the case under consideration was certified to Congress, legal interest from December 2, 1899, with costs of suits, was included in the certification. Congress saw fit to ignore this implied recommendation that interest be paid, and appropriated for the amount of the judgment with interest at 4 per cent therefor, from the date of the rendition thereof only, thus recognizing the principle of law stated in the case above cited. * * * I find, however, that no appropriation has been made covering the costs, etc.

The fact is, this has previously been referred by the Attorney-General to Congress for an appropriation for principal and interest, and also for the costs. Now, Congress having had this matter certified, and having refused in the past to appropriate for this interest, I think we are justified in insisting further upon this disagreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is an item in this conference report in reference to my former colleague in this House [Senator BANKHEAD]. I would like to ask the gentleman if he proposes to allow a separate vote on that item?

Mr. TAWNEY. I suppose it is within the power of any Member of the House to ask for a separate vote on any of these amendments. I shall give an opportunity to the gentleman if he desires it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman, when he reaches a convenient time, if he will allow me a few minutes?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Was not the Commissioner of the Bureau of Forestry on that Inland Waterways Commission?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Commissioner of the Bureau of Forestry? I do not know; I think he was, but I am not certain.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is the compensation of any other individual who was a member of that Waterways Commission excepted to except that of Senator BANKHEAD?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no other member of the Inland Waterways Commission for whom it is proposed to appropriate money to pay either for his services or for his expenses. Mr. BANKHEAD is the only member of that commission for whom an appropriation is asked to compensate him for the time served on that commission.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will you allow me one more question? You do not object to giving me the reasons why there is opposition to this payment, do you? What reasons are urged for not paying it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is what I wanted to ask; I would like to have a full statement of just what the circumstances are.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the Inland Waterways Commission was appointed by the President of the United States very soon after the adjournment of the last Congress. On the last day of the session of the last Congress it was proposed to authorize by a joint resolution the creation or the appointment of this commission. A resolution for that purpose was offered in the House. It did not receive consideration. Now, the law, section 3679 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act approved February 27, 1906, reads as follows:

Nor shall any Department or officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ services in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property.

It is plain, Mr. Speaker, from the language of this section, that without express authority of law no Department and no executive officer of the Government can lawfully accept voluntary services or appoint any person to a position that has not been created by law; that being so, and the resolution proposing to authorize the appointment of this commission having failed to pass, there was, therefore, absolutely no authority for the appointment of this commission. Under this statute it is not within the power of any officer of the Government to create any obligation whatever imposing upon the Government or upon Congress the duty of appropriating any money to meet the same. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that the House is justified in acquiescing in the unauthorized appointment of this by agreeing to this Senate amendment and appropriate money for either the services or the expenses of this or of any other member of this commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman states that there was no authority for the appointment of this commission. Should he not say its appointment was prohibited by law?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have read the law, which I think every Member of this House is capable of interpreting for himself. I regret, in answer to the gentleman from New York, to say that, in my opinion, the employment of services of this character is prohibited by the statute which I have just read. I do not criticise or question the motives of the Chief Executive in appointing this commission. I do not say this by way of criticism; I simply state it as a fact, that under the existing law there is no authority for the creation of this commission, and, therefore, there is no authority for appropriating any money for either the expenses or compensation of any member of the commission. If the law did not prohibit the appointment and we made the appropriation, we could not then be charged with acquiescing in the doing of that which was prohibited by law; otherwise that charge can be successfully made. That, Mr. Speaker, is all that I care to say in regard to this amendment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to inquire, Mr. Speaker, who are the other members of the commission?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not give the personnel of the commission. I will say, however, it is my understanding that every other member of the commission was either a Member of the House, a member of the Senate, or a person holding some office in the Government.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And receiving a salary?

Mr. TAWNEY. And receiving the compensation provided by law.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what was the total amount of increases added by the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. TAWNEY. A little over $300,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, I understand the committee have yielded to all of those amendments except an item of about $1,000 and an item of $400?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; the gentleman is mistaken. The Senate has receded from its amendments on a number of these items. For example, they added $42,000 for furnishing and equipping the Municipal Building in this city. They yielded all of it, with the exception of $5,000, increasing the amount from $107,000 to $112,000. Then there were one or two other minor matters, but the increases added by the Senate principally were the audited accounts certified to the Senate after the passage of the urgent deficiency bill in the House. The principal increases, as the gentleman will see from the printed bill, are claims allowed by the Auditor for the War Department subsequent to the passage of the bill in the House, claims allowed by the Auditor for the Interior Department, claims allowed by the Auditor for the State and other Departments, and, I think, claims allowed by the Auditor for the Treasury Department. Those are all additional amounts.

Mr. HEPBURN. The House could vote down the proposition of the gentleman now pending and it would still appear that the House was represented in the conference and that the conferees of the House were not, using a common phrase, entirely "skunked."

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not absolutely submerged.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to submit an observation or two in relation to the statement that the Inland Waterways Commission was appointed in violation of an express statute, and a highly penal one at that. I have the section of the law that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] quoted in the course of his remarks. And, if I understand the authority or the object of the Inland Waterways Commission, it is not covered by this statute at all. It is not within its purpose or spirit. I understand that the Inland Waterways Commission was a commission selected by the President to secure information for his use, perhaps, and for the use of the country, for its instruction, respecting one of the important resources of the United States. It is on the same legal status as was the commission selected to investigate the anthracite coal controversy in Pennsylvania several years ago. I think the President of the United States does have the right to select a volunteer commission to seek information for the benefit of the President, at least, without violating any statute. The waterway commission was not, from the standpoint of the law, in the employment of the Government. It was a voluntary commission, seeking information for the benefit—personal or official benefit—of the Chief Executive, in order that he might make the necessary recommendations to the Congress that the Constitution of the United States requires of him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will you please give the authority the President has, in face of direct law, to do this thing?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My position is that there is no direct law prohibiting it, and that it is within the incidental powers of the President. The President, in seeking information for his official duties, may use any reasonable means he sees fit. This commission was not serving the Government, it was not in the employment of the Government in the sense of the law, but it was in the employment of the President.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman understand the President has the right to commit this House to an appropriation in the face of law?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not by any manner of means. I do not understand that the President is asking the House to pay this claim as a legal demand. This commission was purely a voluntary commission selected by the President, without express authority of law, but it is not, I repeat, forbidden by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Out of what appropriation were the members of this commission paid?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I assume they are not to be paid out of any appropriation unless one be made therefor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have been paid out of an appropriation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Congress of the United States makes a great many appropriations for claims for which there is no legal basis. It does it repeatedly at every one of its sessions. There may be no law authorizing the payment of the expenses of this commission, and there is no law requiring the Congress to pay any compensation to any one of its members. I am not disputing that proposition, but the statement was made here that this commission was appointed by the President of the United States in direct violation of the law. That is the proposition I took the floor to controvert. It is quite a serious charge to make that the President of the United States has violated a penal law of the country. It is clear to any one who has taken the pains to examine the law in question that the charge is wholly unfounded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire if the gentleman will give the information, if he has it, out of what appropriation the expenses so far incurred have been paid?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, the gentleman from New York is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I know he has infinitely more knowledge upon that subject than I. I do not know out of what appropriation the expenses of this commission have been paid, or whether they have been paid at all. If they have been paid without authorization of Congress they were improperly paid. This statute applies purely to the heads of Departments accepting voluntary services from others for the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will read the law——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have read it.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). It states "or any executive officer."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But "for the service of the Government," employment "for the Government." This employment was not "for the Government." It was not authorized for the Government any more than the investigation of the coal strike or the industrial situation at Goldfield.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then, on your own statement, why should Congress be compelled to pay the expense?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not say that Congress should pay the commission. I do not contend that this claim ought to be paid. I admit there is no legal liability on the part of the Government. It is not a public claim. It is discretionary with Congress whether it shall be paid. I simply took the floor to urge that the commission was not appointed in violation of law.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask him if there was any authority by the Executive to authorize these expenses to be paid?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know of any express authority except it was the general authority the Executive has to obtain information in such proper channels as he may deem advisable.

Mr. BUTLER. Was there any implied authority?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, there may be no authority, but there is no law prohibiting the President from seeking information through any proper channels.

Mr. TAWNEY. In reply to the gentleman, I want to call his attention to the fact that he predicates his whole argument upon the statement that this law relates to service "for the Government." Now, the gentleman from Indiana is not entirely correct. I am not inclined to give this statute a technical construction for the purpose of finding a basis upon which to refuse this appropriation. I have endeavored to give the statute the most liberal construction possible. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is no language in this law which will justify the construction of the gentleman from Indiana that these services were personal to the Executive and are therefore not prohibited by this statute. The language is:

> Nor shall any Department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal services in excess of that authorized by law, with the exception of certain emergency involving loss of life or the property of the Government.

If these services were not rendered for the Government, why are we asked to pay for them?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. These all constitute services for the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. Services for the Government or personal service.

The gentleman from New York stated the expenses of this Commission have been paid. My information is to the effect that the expenses of this Commission have not only not been paid, but can not be paid under section 3681, which reads as follows:

> No accounting or disbursing officer of the Government shall allow or pay any account or charge whatever, growing out of, or in any way connected with, any commission or inquiry, except courts-martial or courts of inquiry in the military or naval service of the United States, until special appropriations shall have been made by law to pay such accounts and charges. This section, however, shall not extend to the contingent fund connected with the foreign intercourse of the Government, placed at the disposal of the President.

Now, here is an express statute which prohibits the accounting officers of the Government from paying any claim made by or on account of any commission, with only one exception, and that exception relates to the contingent fund connected with the foreign intercourse of the Government.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York stated a few minutes ago that payment had been made out of the Public Treasury to members of this Inland Waterways Commission and that he and other members of the committee, if I understood him correctly, were unable to ascertain the fund from which payment had been made.

There is no evidence, is there, to show that any payment whatever has been made to any member of this Commission from any fund whatever?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; there is no evidence to show it, and under this statute which I have just read I do not think any payments could possibly pass the auditing officers of the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. So far as the Appropriations Committee knows, no member of the Commission has made claim for any payment except the gentleman whose bill is now before the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman said that I had stated that some of the expenses of this Commission had been paid out of the public funds.

Mr. TAWNEY. I so understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is evidently aware of the source from which I had that information. Has he since investigated and ascertained that no payment was made?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have since investigated, and find that no expense of that Commission has been paid from any appropriation whatever. The information upon which I made the statement to the gentleman from New York on yesterday was contained in a letter which indicated that those expenses had been paid; but upon further inquiry I find that the matter in the letter that I spoke of referred to the other members of the Commission receiving compensation for their services, and not expenses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to have it understood that my statement was inadvertently based upon that information.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated a while ago that he thought all the members of this Commission were officeholders of some sort, and drawing salaries, except Senator BANKHEAD.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have been so informed.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know who the secretary of the Commission is?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not.

Mr. MANN. Doctor McGee, I believe, is the secretary of that Commission. If he is holding any office under the Government it is a new thing to me.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. He is Chief of the Bureau of Ethnology, is he not?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Mississippi says he is Chief of the Bureau of Ethnology. He has not been connected with that bureau for years, and never was the chief. He is living in St. Louis, or was until he came to Washington this winter, and I only asked for the purpose of ascertaining whether, in order to pay him, he had been given some other position.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not enlighten the gentleman from Illinois on that. As this matter came up on the Senate amendment, I had no opportunity to know, until conferring with the other branch of the legislative department as to what the facts were in regard to the personnel of the Commission; but I am now informed that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] was the only member of the Commission who was not an officer of the Government during the time that that Commission was serving. The officers of the Commission, including the secretary, I do not know, and I do not know whether he is connected with the Government at all or not, or whether he received any compensation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me ten minutes?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire the attention of the House, because I think this report puts my former colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] in a wrong position. I do not think that the report shows the true position he took in reference to this matter, and I do not think this House ought to misjudge one of the old Members of this House and a former colleague of many of us.

I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I was a member of his committee, a member of the Deficiency subcommittee when the statute that he refers to was written. There is not any question in the world, there is no doubt whatever, that that statute was not written to limit the executive authority of the President of the United States, because this body has no power to limit his executive functions. He derives his powers from the Constitution of the United States and not from us, and he has the power to appoint commissions or agents to investigate for him great public matters whenever he desires to do so. As to the question of pay, as to whether they shall serve for nothing or whether we shall pay them after he appoints them, that is another question, and I do not dispute at all that this House has the right to reject the payment of this claim if it desires to do so.

But that the appointment of the Inland Waterways Commission was violation of law is another question. The statute that the gentleman refers to was to prevent the executive officers of this Government from creating deficiencies in their Departments and for no other purpose. I was on the committee when the law was written, aided in its writing, and aided in its passage, and I know for what purpose it was created. It was created purely for the purpose of preventing an executive officer of this Government from running in debt in his Department and then calling on Congress to pay that indebtedness, and had no reference whatever to the President of the United States.

Now, I ask the House to consider the facts as to the appointment of Mr. BANKHEAD on this Commission. The President of the United States conceiving that it was his duty as Chief Magistrate of this land to get behind the great public sentiment in the United States with reference to building up and developing the waterways of the country, concluded that it was wise to appoint a commission to investigate and lay the facts as to the development of the waterways of the United States before him. He desired able and experienced men to represent him on that Commission, and in the selection of the Commission he selected every man an officer of the United States except one. Every man that he named on that Commission was receiving pay from the Federal Government except Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. BANKHEAD was not an applicant for that position. The appointment sought him and not he the appointment. He was out of Congress, his Senatorial term had not begun, and he informed me, and I know it to be true that he informed the President when he was offered the appointment on the commission that he could not afford to take this place without compensation. The President told him that he would recommend to Congress—not that he would pay it, he could not pay it and he knew he could not pay it—but he told him that he would recommend to Congress that he be paid a reasonable compensation for his services and expenses on that commission. It was with that understanding that Mr. BANKHEAD accepted service on this commission, giving his time to the Government.

Mark you, it was not for one moment the understanding that the President of the United States had a right to make a contract that would bind this House, and he did not do it. But the President of the United States asked Mr. BANKHEAD to serve on this commission because Mr. BANKHEAD had been the senior Democratic member of the River and Harbor Committee, because he had been a man of lifelong experience in this work, because he wanted the services of Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. BANKHEAD told him that under his financial condition he could not afford to take the time to devote to that service without compensation. Now, it is up to the House, not to pay a legal debt—nobody contends that it is a legal obligation, but the Government has received his services, and it has been the precedent for many years to pay these commissions. You paid for the strike commission, you have paid one hundred obligations contracted by the Executive before without him consulting you in advance. You have got a right to pay this if you want to, and I just want this House to understand that the President of the United States asked this man to serve, that Mr. BANKHEAD did not ask for the appointment, and the President said that he would recommend to the House to pay the bill. You have a right to pay it if you want to, and as for myself I shall vote to pay it under the circumstances.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the amendments that are disagreed to. I want to find out what the ground was upon which they refused to agree to the Senate amendment which appropriates money for the purpose of paying the expenses of prosecuting Hyde and others, whether the conference committee refused on the ground that there shall be no money appropriated for this purpose or whether upon the ground that it shall be appropriated to be paid for in part by the District of Columbia.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the conferees on the part of the House declined to recede and concur in the Senate amendment for the reason that when I asked for unanimous consent that the Senate amendments to the urgent deficiency bill be taken from the Speaker's table and sent to conference I was asked if the House would be given an opportunity, if consent was granted, to vote for this proposition, and I promised the House that an opportunity would be given, and in order to keep faith with the House we brought the proposition back here for the House to dispose of as it sees fit.

Mr. KEIFER. I am under the impression that the House bill provided for substantially the same thing as is provided for in the Senate amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Exactly the same thing.

Mr. KEIFER. If it is the same proposition as in Senate amendment 11 upon which the conferees of the two Houses are unable to agree, I do not understand why the Senate did not agree to the House proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. The House proposition was not before the Senate for the reason that it went out on a point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I do not understand why the House conferees did not agree to the Senate proposition, which is substantially the same as embodied in the original bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TAWNEY. Because the House conferees promised that they would not agree to it, but would bring it back here to the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know to whom the promise was made.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was made to the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say that one of the conferees objected to agreeing to the Senate amendment for the reason that we have had additional information since the bill was before the House.

In other words, if you will pardon me, this whole case went before Judge Stafford last spring, and the Government expended $25,000 in bringing Government witnesses here, and Judge Stafford ruled that this case could not be tried in the city of Washington and must be tried in the State of California, where the crime was committed. We had that additional information.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I am always willing to be interrupted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], but he is talking about another proposition or another case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is the Hyde-Benson case that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. KEIFER. He is talking about other cases. I understand that indictments have been found under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States in the courts of the District of Columbia against Hyde, Dimond, Benson, and Schneider.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is the case I refer to.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, the gentleman is referring to cases that have never been tried by the judge he refers to, because they are still pending in the United States court in the District of Columbia. The question, Mr. Speaker, that seems to trouble the gentleman is whether or not we should not sit here as a high court of justice to determine in advance whether the Attorney-General of the United States and the Federal court of this District would be right if they held that the venue for the trial of these persons was in the District of Columbia. I understand the proposition is, and this is the claim made by the defendants' attorneys, that the defendants ought not to be put on trial so for from home. If we do not make this appropriation they won't be put on trial here, or anywhere. They claim that the venue is somewhere else. As a general proposition, in every criminal case there is but one venue, or but one place of jurisdiction, and that is where the crime was committed, and the Attorney-General and those that have had these cases in charge have procured indictments in the United States courts in the District of Columbia. They desire to put these indicted persons on trial in the District of Columbia, where they believe the court has jurisdiction. Then the question of venue will be tried and not disposed of, as the gentleman from Georgia suggests, by somebody, as here, injecting the suggestion that there is no venue at all. It is absurd to ask us to sit here and in advance determine for the court and the Attorney-General and everybody else that the court in the District of Columbia has no jurisdiction to try the case at all, because the crime, in our opinion, was committed somewhere else. This is unusual. The question of venue probably can not be raised upon the indictments in these cases by demurrer or motion, but we will have to depend upon the testimony taken before the judge upon the trial of these defendants, when it will develop whether or not the essential element of the crime was committed in this District or somewhere else. Probably it must depend entirely upon the testimony on the trial to a court and jury, and we are asked to sit in judgment now and say:

> Oh, no; it is our humble judgment that there is no venue; some man said so, and we ought to acquit these men on the floor of the House of Representatives on the indictments without a trial, no matter whether they are guilty or not.

That is the proposition that we are confronting now. The original appropriation bill was right. This is right. We ought to appropriate the necessary money to carry on these prosecutions. If they fail, they will be like other criminal prosecutions that are failing in all the courts, State and Federal, all over the land. I do not know; I can not myself sit in judgment upon the question now and determine whether there is venue in the District of Columbia or somewhere else. This is not the place to take the testimony on the question of where the crime was committed, if one was committed. If it was alleged to be in California we would have the same proposition, that there is no venue out there, and in no case would there be any prosecution anywhere.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman what he has to say about the constitutional right that the defendants have to be tried where the crime was committed?

Mr. KEIFER. Everybody agrees with that. That does not follow the constitutional right alone, but it belongs to the legislation of the land. That rule is older than the Constitution of the United States. It had its foundation in the common law and the laws of England, and we are not determining that question; but the gentlemen object, some of them, to this appropriation because the court might find that the constitutional right to be tried was in the District of Columbia. We know if the court on the trial should find that the crime was not committed in the District of Columbia that the venue will fail and jurisdiction will fail, and for the purposes of the trial the defendants will be acquitted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will pardon me for one more suggestion——

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The United States Government is perfectly able out of her immense resources to pay the expenses of the prosecution, but who will pay the thousands and thousands of dollars unnecessarily brought upon the defendants by bringing their witnesses all the way from California? Who is going to take care of that?

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] is this, that when this body meets to make appropriations to carry on criminal trials in Federal courts, it ought to first inquire whether it will not be a hardship upon the indicted party to try him at all.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; the gentleman misstates the position.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the proposition the gentleman claims that we are brought here to meet and decide.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman misstates the position. The first thing to inquire is this, Where is the man's right under the Constitution to be tried? If it is in California and you undertake to force it into this District, then the question of expenses comes up and properly comes up.

Mr. KEIFER. We come back, Mr. Speaker, to the same question we started with, and that is whether or not, having found indictments in the District of Columbia Federal court, which on their face, I presume, show that the proper venue is here, the indicted parties must be brought here and tried as is usual.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say one word in answer to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on the amendment, which I ask the House to further insist upon its disagreement to. This matter rises far above any personal consideration of his colleague or any personal desire to compensate him for the time that he served on this Commission. If it was a matter of personal favor to his former colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] I would be as willing as any other man to extend any favor that I possibly could; but under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the services of the gentleman from Alabama upon this Commission were without authority of law, and for Congress to appropriate this money in this instance would be virtually acquiescing in the unauthorized creation of this Commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman see any distinction between the creation of this Commission and the creation of the Strike Commission some years ago?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not recall all the circumstances under which the Strike Commission was created.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I mean as a matter of law and——

Mr. TAWNEY. Nor is it clear to my mind that there is any analogy whatever between the Strike Commission and this Inland Waterways Commission. When that Commission was appointed human life and property were involved, while the appointment of this Commission involved nothing of the kind. With all due respect to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], their appointment was official, not personal. The services of this Inland Waterways Commission were rendered for the Government; they were to render services for the Government, and in the other instance the Commission was appointed voluntarily for the purpose of settling a dispute between certain industries and their employees which threatened the most serious consequences to life and property.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But both Commissions were appointed for the purpose of obtaining information for the President of the United States, and he so stated in appointing them, and, if I am not mistaken, the gentleman from Minnesota voted as I did. I voted with him to pay the Strike Commission for their services and expenses rendered.

Mr. TAWNEY. That proposition is not at all analogous to the one we are considering. I ask now, Mr. Speaker, for a vote on my motion.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRINCE. Is not there a contingent fund that the Executive has at his disposal out of which this money can be paid, as it was in the nature of advice or information obtained by the Executive for the good of the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. I know of none and I know of no way whereby the expenditure, even if there was a contingent fund, could be paid under section 3681, which prohibits the accounting officers from passing any accounts on account of expenses incurred by or on account of any commission.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment covering the Hyde-Benson case proposed by the Senate is the item which went out of the bill in the House on the point of order. Briefly, it presents two propositions: First, as to whether Congress shall depart from its present established custom, that the United States and District shall each pay half the expense of the courts of the District, and for the United States to pay the entire expense for the trial of this case. I can see no reason given why, when the United States at large pays half the expense of the trial of the will cases, the real estate cases, the ordinary chancery cases, the justice of the peace, as it were, cases in the courts of the District, where nine-tenths of the business is local—I can see no reason why when we pay half of their local court expenses they should not pay half the expense in this case. That is one aspect of the proposition. The other is this: I trust that no Member of this House who is as poor as I am will ever be called upon to be carried 3,000 miles across the country to be tried on a conspiracy charge, where the venue might be laid in perhaps a half dozen places, and have the Government pour out its treasure to bring witnesses across the continent when the party accused has no money with which to bring his witnesses. The Government could have tried the case in the District of Columbia or in the United States courts in California——

Mr. KEIFER. How do you know?

Mr. MANN. The man has no discretion in the matter. If he is tried here the Government pours out a fund of $60,000. For what? To bring the witnesses across the continent. A few years ago many of us thought that the great State of Kentucky was a little bit oppressive when it appropriated $100,000 to aid in the prosecution of the assassin of a governor of that State, but the cause there was much more extreme than it is here when it is proposed to appropriate $60,000 to bring the witnesses of the Government across the continent and leave the poor defendants to bear the expenses for their own witnesses. It is not justice. It is not the proper way to try cases. It were better that these men, who may be guilty, should go free than that the doctrine should be established that the great Government of the United States should have the opportunity to convict a man because he was too poor to bring his witnesses to court.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Can not he apply to the judge to pay his expenses?

Mr. MANN. He can not, as I understand it.

Mr. NEEDHAM. The United States district attorney told me this morning that he could if he made a showing that he was unable to do it.

Mr. MANN. That is a case in the District, but that case, as I understand it, does not apply to this case at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I now ask for a vote, unless a separate vote is demanded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on amendment No. 5, and move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not clear whether the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] demanded the previous question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] demands a separate vote on amendment No. 5. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I ask if it is not in order, even if the previous question is demanded, to move to recede and concur, as that has precedence over the motion to nonconcur?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not trying to cut out the gentleman from making that motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I have no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand if the previous question is ordered that he can move to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that there was a decision of that kind made by Speaker Reed upon a war measure, founded upon the Digest as it was at that time, and the Digest so stated. But subsequent examination of the authority referred to showed that precedent did not sustain the Digest. Since that time the Chair will state that the ruling has perhaps been followed, but it is not necessary for the Chair to intimate what the ruling might be under those conditions, because the question does not arise. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] says that he has no desire to cut out the motion, and perhaps the previous question would cover both motions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, if the gentleman withdraws the motion to allow me to make the other motion, I move to recede and concur in amendment No. 5.

Mr. TAWNEY. On that I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That would take precedence of the other, as it brings the two bodies together if the motion should be agreed to at this stage, the previous question not having been ordered. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House do recede from its disagreement with the Senate as to amendment No. 5 and concur in the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, that is the amendment, I will say for the information of the House, appropriating $1,875 for the services of Mr. BANKHEAD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

No. 5. Page 17, after line 22, insert:
"To pay John H. Bankhead for his services as a member of the Inland Waterways Commission, from March 14 to June 18, 1907, $1,875."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, that the House do recede from its disagreement and concur in the amendment which has just been read.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 56, noes 101.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, to further insist on disagreement to amendment No. 5.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division on that.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 117, noes 12.

So the House determined to further insist on its disagreement.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement and concur in amendment No. 11.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks a separate vote on amendment No. 11. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

All expenses that may be incurred and otherwise chargeable to the United States and District of Columbia in the approaching trial of the case of the United States against Hyde, Dimond, Benson, and Schneider in the District of Columbia shall be chargeable wholly to the United States and be paid from the respective appropriations made for expenses of United States courts out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. What is the motion?

Mr. NEEDHAM. My motion is to recede and concur.

Mr. TAWNEY. My motion is that the House further insist on its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from California takes precedence.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Is not that debatable? I desire to discuss the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized and has control of the time. Does he yield to the gentleman?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yielded to the gentleman from California to make that motion. If he desires to discuss it for five minutes, I will yield him five minutes.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I called at the office of the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia this morning and obtained from him a statement in regard to this case, which I will ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The indictment in the Hyde-Benson case was returned in the District of Columbia, for the reason that the proof of acts by the defendants in furtherance of the conspiracy charged relates chiefly to this District and shows that the conspiracy was in continuous existence and active operation in this District during the entire period covered by the indictment. This is not true as to any other judicial district.

Selections under the act of June 4, 1897, while required to be filed originally in the land office of the land district where the selected lands were situated, had to be forwarded by the local land officers to the General Land Office in this District for consideration and action. Here only could the selections be examined and approved for patent, and here only could the patents issue. Here it was therefore, by bribery of Government officials in the General Land Office, and by other acts in part apparently lawful and in part unlawful and criminal, that the most important acts in furtherance of the conspiracy were performed, and were continuously performed for more than three years. One of the defendants remained in this city in the performance of such acts for more than a year, and another visited the city frequently during the time and here performed similar acts.

The acts done by the defendants elsewhere than in this District, within the period covered by the indictment, related chiefly to the filing of the selection applications and required proofs in the numerous local land offices throughout the public-land States—a few in one land district, a few in another, and a few in another, and so on, covering tracts of land in nearly every land district of the United States. The ultimate object of all such acts, however, was the securing of patents from the General Land Office of this District for the selected lands, and here it was that the defendants were moved to and did put in their most criminal and most effective work. The evidence of this is entirely clear, whereas it is not clear whether the selection applications and proofs, as to most of the lands covered by the indictment, were filed in the aforesaid local land offices by one or more of the defendants, or by innocent purchasers from them of the supposed and apparent right of selection.

As a general rule, the supposed right of selection was sold by the defendants to other persons before the selection applications would be filed, and in very many, if not in most, instances the purchaser would himself file the selection application in the local land office, though usually in the name of one of the defendants or in the name of some one acting for them. This rendered it exceedingly difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to fix the venue, with any degree of certainty as to the proof, elsewhere than in the District of Columbia.

The investigation disclosed very little correspondence or other transactions as between the defendants and the local land officers throughout the country, and such as was secured was of doubtful sufficiency upon which to base jurisdiction.

The evidence disclosed very few, if any, acts in furtherance of the conspiracy done in the northern district of California within the period of the statute of limitations, which fact rendered it wholly inadvisable to undertake to sustain an indictment in that district. The same is true of the district of Oregon.

Upon the whole case the officers in charge of the investigation deemed the course determined upon to be not only wise and proper, but the only course that could be pursued with any degree of safety to the interests of the Government.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, that statement shows that this conspiracy was to obtain title to public lands, or the right to select public lands in every public-land State in the United States, and this conspiracy was entered into and carried out in the city of Washington. Now, the practical question before the House is, Will we give the Government sufficient money to bring these defendants to trial? There is not sufficient in the general fund of the District, and the United States Government, and unless Congress appropriates the money, these defendants will come and demand an immediate trial, knowing that the law officers have not the money with which to try them, and they would thus be able to escape trial.

This is one of the most gigantic conspiracies, in my judgment, in all the land-fraud cases, and it is in the interest of public justice that Congress should give sufficient money to try this case. I do not believe there is anything in the contention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The United States district attorney informed me this morning, unless I misunderstood him, that if these defendants should come into court and say that they were not able to obtain their witnesses, by reason of their poverty, they could have the compulsory process of the Government. If I am correctly informed, Hyde and Benson are wealthy men and entirely able to pay any expense to which they are put in these cases.

Mr. Speaker, unless this appropriation is given there will be a great miscarriage of public justice, in my judgment.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I have heard it stated—I do not know how it is—that if these cases are not tried in the District of Columbia at present, the statute of limitations will run, with the cases to be brought in other States.

Mr. NEEDHAM. My understanding is that there is no probability of their trial, except under the present indictment.

Mr. HAYES. I will ask my colleague whether or not this case referred to in this bill is the same case that went to the Supreme Court a little time ago on a writ of habeas corpus, and reported in volume 199 of the United States Reports?

Mr. NEEDHAM. I understood they did.

Mr. HAYES. Well, Mr. Speaker, then it occurs to me that it is extremely doubtful, according to the language of this decision, which I have before me, whether these defendants could ever be convicted. It appears to be reasonably conclusive from the reading of this opinion that they could never be convicted, and therefore the appropriation to bring witnesses here would be a waste of public money.

Mr. NEEDHAM. That is a matter for the Department of Justice to consider.

Mr. HAYES. Now, the Supreme Court has made a decision——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. On what ground does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. NEEDHAM. My colleague refers to a part of the dissenting opinion of Justice Peckham, making an insinuation——

Mr. HAYES. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. NEEDHAM. As I understand it, my colleague refers to a part of the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Peckham to the effect that that might be the case; but the majority opinion of the court, as I understand it, carries no such insinuation; and in answer to my colleague I want to say that that is a matter for the Department of Justice to determine, and it is not for Congress to withhold a sufficient fund for trial.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me a few minutes?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the statement of my colleague is correct in regard to these men. I believe that they are fully as guilty—some of them, at least—as he claims, and yet I am a little in doubt as to whether this House ought to make this appropriation or ought to recede from its position as to this amendment. These cases are cases of conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States, and from this opinion of the Supreme Court, which I will not undertake to read to the House, I conclude that there is no question but what this conspiracy was hatched in the State of California or in the State of Oregon and not in the city of Washington, and that one overt act only was committed here. Now, the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that in conspiracy cases of this kind, where the overt act occurred does not matter, that the venue would lie where the conspiracy was formed, and that the overt act might be committed in Canada, in England, on the high seas, or any place—that that does not affect it.

This case came before the Supreme Court on a writ of habeas corpus, and a majority of the court refused to look into the evidence upon which the indictment was based to determine whether or not there was probable cause for bringing this indictment. Mr. Justice Peckham, with whom concurred Mr. Justice White and Mr. Justice McKenna, maintained that they should go behind the indictment and look into the evidence, and he apparently did go behind the indictment and look at the evidence.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What was the question raised before the court in this case?

Mr. HAYES. The question was that there was not probable cause that the offense charged had been committed. It was claimed that the evidence did not show any offense to have been committed in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is, that the indictment ought not to have been found on the facts?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; that there was no proof that any conspiracy was ever formed in the District of Columbia, and the court held that they could not go behind the indictment on a writ of habeas corpus to determine that fact. That was the holding of the majority of the court, but Mr. Justice Peckham claimed that they should go behind it. In delivering his opinion he uses this language, which I beg to read to the House:

The right—

To have this determined—

is none the less when the want of probable cause rests upon the conclusive evidence of the absence of the defendants from the District of Columbia at the time when the indictment alleges the conspiracy was formed in such District. If defendants were not then there, they could not be guilty of the crime charged in the indictment. This case is an extreme illustration of the very great hardship involved in sending a man 3,000 miles across the continent, from California or Oregon to this District for trial, where he has to bring his witnesses, and where on such trial it will appear that the court must direct an acquittal because the averment of the formation of the conspiracy in Washington, D. C., is shown to be false, to a demonstration.

Mr. NEEDHAM. That is from the dissenting opinion?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; but it is from the men who investigated the evidence upon which the indictment was formed.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And your point is that the majority of the court did not discuss the evidence at all?

Mr. HAYES. Did not discuss the evidence at all; refused to discuss it. Therefore it must be apparent, it seems to me, that an appropriation of this kind to bring all these witnesses here will be a waste of public money if Mr. Justice Peckham is correct.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from California permit a question?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman or any other lawyer in this House suggest how the question of jurisdiction can be authorized to be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States for determination before trial in order to determine the question of jurisdiction in advance of the trial, and therefore save the expense of the trial both to the Government and to the defendants? If there was any way whereby that could be done, it could be agreed to in conference, and I would be perfectly willing to do it. In view of the decision of the Supreme Court I admit that it is practically impossible to authorize that investigation by the Supreme Court into the facts for the purpose of determining the question of jurisdiction without having the evidence before it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the chairman that the very case the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] cites answers the inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It holds that there is no way to determine in advance of the trial the question of venue or jurisdiction; that the court can not go behind the indictment. That is the whole question we are dealing with here.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. HAYES. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. There has grown up in our State in recent years a practice allowed by the court in criminal procedure for the court to order the minutes before the grand jury of all the testimony taken to be reported to the court for the use of the defendant, and on those minutes a motion is made to quash the indictment because of the insufficiency of the evidence. Now, whether that suggestion will help the conferees in any way I do not know. We have that practice, which has grown up out of the code of criminal procedure in our State. There is a stenographer before the grand jury, and all the evidence is taken down, and this is frequently resorted to. The attorney for the prisoner asks for an inspection of the minutes of the evidence before the grand jury, and that is brought into court, and if it is deemed insufficient to sustain an indictment a motion is made in court to quash the indictment for that reason.

Mr. KEIFER. That is in the gentleman's own State; does he know of any other State in the Union that has that procedure?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know; we have had it for the last five or six years.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I am not enough of a lawyer to frame, on the spur of the moment while on my feet, a statute or law that will meet the objection of the gentleman from Minnesota. I want to say that some of these men——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is the date of the indictment?

Mr. HAYES. I have forgotten the date; it is something like 1904.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is the gentleman familiar with the facts so that he can answer this question? Is this appropriation asked for this particular case or is it because the general appropriation for the maintenance of the court has been exhausted? Is it necessary for the trial of these cases that this particular appropriation should be made?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that the expenses incident to the trial of this case will create a deficiency of $60,000 in the general appropriation for the maintenance of the court.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That deficiency will be in the appropriations for the trial of criminal cases in the District?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; in so far as it is proposed to pay all the expenses incident to the trial of these cases out of the general fund appropriated for the judiciary, one-half of that expense is charged to the District of Columbia and the other half to the General Government.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And it is proposed in this case that the General Government shall pay it all?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In the other cases the Government pays one-half of the expense?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. I would like two minutes more.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from California two minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I do not think this appropriation will be effective to accomplish the purpose. That is why I doubt the wisdom of our receding in this case. Secondly, I recall that one of the principal objections that our forefathers urged against King George was that he took defendants across the water to be tried for offenses far away from their homes and far away from the places where the offenses were committed. I doubt whether this House wants to put itself on record as approving proceedings of this kind—taking defendants far away from the place where the offense was committed and bringing them here for trial at great expense to themselves and to the Government.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to inquire whether indictments have been found elsewhere. It seems that offenses have been committed in other States under other jurisdictions.

Mr. HAYES. I am not able to state whether any indictments for this particular offense have been found, but at least one of these defendants has been convicted in the State of California for some of these land frauds and has been sentenced, and other indictments are pending there, as I have stated.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. For the same conspiracy?

Mr. HAYES. Perhaps not for the same conspiracy, but a conspiracy of the same sort. I have no doubt that if the evidence is sufficient they will be convicted in California just as easily as in Washington.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question. If this appropriation is not made, will the cases be tried in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HAYES. I do not know.

Mr. NEEDHAM. No; they can not try them without an appropriation or a provision of this kind.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I know next to nothing about these cases, and I know nothing about the defendants or their lawyers, but I have called to my mind very vividly a year or two ago what could be done in a case like this. A former Member of this House, who had been Commissioner of the Land Office after he had served a previous term in Congress, was indicted for these land frauds. After a long trial in the District here, where he was compelled to pay the expenses of his witnesses across the continent, he has gone back home acquitted, bankrupt, his property all gone, his position gone, and everything taken away from him by the Government which he had served; and, having been ruined financially on the trial of the case here in this District, he is to be tried at home upon some case of the same sort. His property and means were all taken away from him in obtaining an acquittal in the District here.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Let me ask the gentleman if that was not for destroying public records in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am not saying whether that case had to be tried here or not. They could have tried him there. I am speaking of the result of the case—brought across the continent upon an indictment which, when presented to the jury with the evidence, was disposed of in a few minutes' time. Nobody pretended, after the evidence was in, that there was any case against Binger Hermann in the District of Columbia, but he has gone home, ruined financially, to endeavor to defend himself at home against new indictments, with the whole power of the National Treasury against him, and because of his case, so far as I am concerned, I never will knowingly vote to drag a man from California to be tried in the District of Columbia when the offense is such that it could be tried in California, where he lives, as well as in the District of Columbia. Perhaps the venue might lie in both places.

Mr. KEIFER. No; it is not possible, and never was.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, in a conspiracy case——

Mr. KEIFER. A conspiracy case does not differ from any other.

Mr. MANN. If there is any venue anywhere in this case, it is in California, and not in the District of Columbia, if there is only one venue; but a conspiracy case may often be tried in a dozen different places.

Mr. BURLESON. But what about these cases being barred by the statute of limitation?

Mr. MANN. I know nothing about that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California, that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I now ask for a vote on my motion, that the House do further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 11.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 110, noes 7.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House do further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 26.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. TAWNEY, Mr. VREELAND, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

AMERICAN PASSPORTS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 223.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interests, the correspondence relating to negotiations with the Russian Government concerning American passports since the adoption of the resolution by the House of Representatives relating to that subject on the 21st day of April, 1904; and also a copy of the circular letter issued by the Department of State to American citizens advising them that upon the Department receiving satisfactory information that they did not intend to go to Russian territory or that they had permission from the Russian Government to return, their application for passport would be reconsidered; and also a copy of the notice accompanying such letter issued by the Department of State, dated May 28, 1907.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, a member of the committee has expressed a desire to speak upon this resolution. I desire to withhold a motion to lay the resolution on the table pending an opportunity for the gentleman to address the House. I ask unanimous consent that twenty minutes on a side be allowed for a discussion of this motion which I propose to make, if it is necessary to have any side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that twenty minutes be allowed on a side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask who is to control the time. Is the time to be in control of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. CAPRON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Who is to control the twenty minutes on the other side?

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that that time should be in my control.

Mr. CAPRON. I propose to yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], after a word in explanation. In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution was referred to the Department of State and in its reply it is stated that it is not deemed compatible with the best interests at this time to communicate the subsequent correspondence with the Russian Government, the committee decided upon the motion which I shall subsequently make, to ask that it be laid on the table. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

The SPEAKER. One moment. Whoever is recognized as being opposed to the motion which the gentleman gives notice he will make at the expiration of forty minutes, or so much time thereof as may be taken, is entitled to recognition in his own right. Does the gentleman yield his own time in addition to the other twenty minutes?

Mr. CAPRON. I do not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will recognize in his own right the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I protest against the tabling of this resolution. The resolution was introduced by my colleague from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] and is an inquiry into the administration of the Department of State. It inquires, as has appeared from the Clerk's reading, first, as to the negotiations between our Government and the Government of Russia since the presentation of the resolution passed by the House of Representatives four years ago (April 21, 1904), and secondly, as to the issuance by the Department of State of a certain circular letter and circular accompanying it, which I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CITIZENSHIP.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, ———, 190–.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of an application for a passport of ——— ———, from which it appears that —— born in ———. Your attention is invited to the inclosed notice to former subjects of Russia who contemplate returning to that country, from which you will perceive that it is a punishable offense under Russian law for a Russian subject to obtain naturalization in any other country without the consent of the Russian Government. While this Government dissents from this requirement, it can not encourage American citizens whom it is likely to affect to place themselves within the sphere of its operation. Upon receiving satisfactory information that —— not intend to go to Russian territory, or that —— permission from the Russian Gov- ernment to return, the application for a passport will be reconsidered immediately.

Returning the application, the certificate of naturalization, and the sum of $1 (——).

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

——— ———,

Chief, Bureau of Citizenship.

[Inclosure.]

RUSSIA.

Notice to American citizens formerly subjects of Russia who contemplate returning to that country.

A Russian subject who becomes a citizen of another country without the consent of the Russian Government commits an offense against Russian law, for which he is liable to arrest and punishment if he returns without previously obtaining the permission of the Russian Government.

This Government dissents from this provision of Russian law, but an American citizen formerly a subject of Russia who returns to that country places himself within the jurisdiction of Russian law and can not expect immunity from its operations.

Jews, whether they were formerly Russian subjects or not, are not admitted to Russia unless they obtain special permission in advance from the Russian Government, and this Department will not issue passports to former Russian subjects or to Jews who intend going to Russian territory unless it has assurance that the Russian Government will consent to their admission.

No one is admitted to Russia without a passport, which must be viséed, or indorsed, by a Russian diplomatic or consular representative.

ELIHU ROOT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 28, 1907.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it clear to the House that in this circular of May 28, 1907, the Department of State refuses the American passport not only to former subjects to Russia who have become naturalized American citizens, but also specifically to all Jews in the United States. Now, this is a most surprising and deplorable chapter of American diplomacy. Four years ago in the House of Representatives I had occasion to make an address upon the question of the dishonoring by Russia of the American passport. At that time, and largely as the result of the efforts of my colleague from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], a resolution passed the House of Representatives requesting the President of the United States to renew negotiations with foreign Governments where discrimination is made between different classes of American citizens on account of their religious faith and to secure uniformity of treatment for all American citizens alike. This is a question which is very near to the hearts of the American people. It touches very closely upon our national honor, and it challenges that political equality forged for us in the blood and sweat of our revolutionary forefathers. But a short time ago it seemed that the question was about to be solved in a way satisfactory alike to our sentiment and our honor, but now our rights have been surrendered, our position has been abandoned and by the very persons appointed to defend it.

The question at issue was, and is, Shall the bearer of an American passport, holding in his hand the highest evidence of American citizenship, be halted, examined as to his religious faith, subjected to inquisition and humiliation, and, finally, because of that religious faith, denied admission to the boundaries of an Empire with which we are at peace and which is bound to us by the most solemn of treaties?

I call the attention of the House to the fact that the right of American citizens to travel and sojourn in Russia is not dependent upon the whims and fancies of an unhappy autocrat, but is based upon rights secured to us by the treaty of 1832 and approved by the enlightened conscience of the civilized world. That treaty gave to Americans and to Russians the reciprocal right to travel and sojourn in the territory of the other country and while there to have the same security and protection as natives of those countries. The right of Americans to enter Russia is therefore so plain that he who runs may read, and yet from the very language of this unequivocal clause of the treaty the Russians, with characteristic duplicity, have within this generation asserted a right to exclude a whole class of American citizens simply on account of their religious faith. They now claim that, having themselves adopted stern repressive laws against Hebrews in the Empire, long after the date of this treaty, the Americans of Jewish faith are not entitled to any more privileges in Russia than their own Jewish subjects. Against this intolerable assumption we have always protested with indignation. They dare not, of course, subject our citizen to the violence and persecution to which the Russian Jew is accustomed, so they shut the door in his face, the treaty notwithstanding.

At the time of the adoption of the treaty Jews in Russia were treated with great justice and consideration. Clouds of ignorance and superstition which had for centuries weighed upon the land had been dispelled by Catherine the Great. In her reign explicit toleration of all foreign religions was a fundamental policy of the Empire. Then came the partition of Poland, and through participation in that historic crime Russia suddenly acquired an enormous Jewish population. At first, and for many years, they were well treated. A wise and beneficent internal policy promoted the assimilation of the Jews into the Rusian Empire. Jewish agricultural colonies were founded. The Hebrews were urged to enter the universities as one of the best methods of breaking down Jewish exclusiveness. Foreign Jews of good repute were invited to domicile themselves in Russia and to purchase and lease real estate there. Down to 1860—for nearly eighty years—and especially under those enlightened rulers, Nicholas the First and Alexander the Liberator, the Jews were a favored people in Russia. In those days of liberality and toleration the treaty of 1832 was concluded with the United States. What warrant, then, is there for the assertion of the latter-day Russian bureaucrats that the right was conferred upon them under this treaty to harass, humiliate, and reject a whole class of American citizens whose sole crime, in their eyes, is a profound and conscientious belief in the Hebrew religion? Not one shade of reason, not one atom of truth or justice, can be found in such an argument. If any American statesman of 1832 had dared to advocate this treaty, believing that thereby he conferred upon a foreign government a contemptible pretext for a religious inquisition and discrimination among our citizens, he would have been swept out of public life with the scorn of his contemporaries. A course so undemocratic, so unrepublican, so un-American, so utterly subversive of our principles of government would have entitled him to national dishonor.

Russian officials, fifty years later, when a change of heart had come over them and fanatical despotism had obscured their reason, invented this pretext and clothed it with the dignity of an international argument. Russia has entirely reversed her attitude toward the Jews and inaugurated a reign of terror which has ground them between the millstones of poverty and despair. In place of generous and beneficent legislation, repression and secret police regulations reduced the Jews to misery. They have become the pity of the world. A tangled web of more than a thousand laws and police ordinances surrounds the Russian Jew to-day, so that he is hardly able to say whether he has any rights at all but the bare right to exist, and even of that he may be deprived.

Russian official stupidity has aroused a mighty and vexatious Jewish question. At first it began with legislation. In 1882 new laws prohibited Jews from buying or renting lands outside the cities and incorporated towns. Restrictions in 1891 were made more severe. To-day the entire Jewish population of Russia—some 5,000,000 of people are crowded into the cities of the southwestern border, in what is known as the "Pale." Here they live in the greatest distress and poverty. Education in Russian universities is practically denied them. Public and professional careers are almost closed to them. Freedom to move from town to town is withheld, and to crown all periodic "pogroms" or semiofficial massacres are instituted, in which whole regions within the Pale have been devastated with the sword, the rifle, and the torch. And the end is not yet. The antisemitic agitation is constantly going on, secretly encouraged by the authorities.

During the year 1906, according to official figures, 22,000 people were injured in the antisemitic outbreaks, most of which were promoted by Governmental agents. I wish to make it plain that this is a matter for which the Russian Government is entirely responsible. Left to himself, the Russian moujhik is amicable and able to live at perfect peace with his Jewish neighbors. It is now believed that the highest persons in the Empire are in sympathy with the movement.

At first, no doubt, some of the agitation was due to economic causes. The sobriety, self-denial, and foresight of the Israelite gave him an enormous advantage over the boozy, procrastinating Russian peasant. But restrictive regulations have now removed the question from the realm of economics. The Jew no longer under the law has the power of industrial competition. The recent massacres were inspired by official hatred and religious fanaticism. Writing in 1893, our minister to Russia, Mr. Andrew D. White, assigned as causes of agitation against the Jews:

> Vague inherited prejudices with myths and legends like those of the Middle Ages.

Mr. Speaker, I have gone into the distressing subject of the present condition of the Jew in Russia to contrast his unhappy lot to-day with his favorable situation in 1832, when this treaty was entered into. But much as they arouse our sympathy, our first efforts must be directed toward the protection of our own citizens. We have even interfered in the past in the internal administration of foreign countries on behalf of oppressed Jews. Shall we do less for our own citizens? Russian official fanaticism must not be visited upon Americans. Russian police regulations may not be invoked in contravention of treaty rights. Every American must be accorded the same reception at the borders of Russia. An American Jew must be able to say:

Keep me out at your peril, or keep out all Americans if you dare.

Their local laws must be subordinated to our treaty rights. Mr. Blaine, in defending these rights, wrote, on July 29, 1881, about the expulsion of American Jews from St. Petersburg:

The obligation of a treaty is supreme and the local law must yield. * * * Where a treaty creates a privilege for aliens in express terms it can not be limited by the operation of domestic law without a serious breach of the good faith which governs the intercourse of nations. * * * The Government of the United States concludes its treaties with foreign States for the equal protection of all classes of American citizens.

This vigorous and patriotic letter followed shortly after a resolution of the House of Representatives of June 10, 1879, protesting against discriminations against American Jews in Russia. It was followed some years later by a reference to the subject by President Cleveland in his annual message of December 2, 1895, and has been the cause of much correspondence ever since, notably by Secretary of State Hay, the greatest, perhaps, of all our foreign Secretaries since John Quincy Adams. Mr. Hay said in his letter to Mr. William Wilson, July 17, 1902, that the United States—can admit no such discrimination amongst its own citizens and can never assent that a foreign State of its own volition can apply a religious test to debar any American citizen from the favor due all.

The culminating point in all these negotiations was reached in 1904, when the House of Representatives adopted the resolution referred to at the beginning of my remarks, requesting President Roosevelt to renew negotiations with a view to putting an end to this obnoxious practice.

That resolution was transmitted to the Russian Government by Ambassador McCormick, and his letter of transmittal is so clear, so forcible, and so manly that I do not hesitate to pronounce it the most American of all this chapter of diplomacy. Mr. McCormick wrote:

This resolution voices not only the feelings of the people, but also a principle which lies at the foundation of our Government. It is for this reason that the question has been, is, and always will be a live question with us and liable to become acute and be brought forward at some time in such a way as to seriously disturb the friendly relations which have always existed between Russia and the United States. Aside from the belief that the treatment accorded by Russia to many of our most reputable citizens is needlessly repressive, public opinion, as your excellency knows, plays a large part in the foreign relations as well as domestic affairs with us, and when underneath this public opinion there lies an important principle, as is the case in the United States, it can not be left out of account by those who have maintained the close relations which it is desired by my Government to see maintained with this great Empire and her august ruler.

Strong words those, strong and manly words, and worthy of the American nation. But what has been the result of them? "Montes gravidunt mus ridiculus exit." All our years of diplomatic labor, the half-veiled threats of Ambassador McCormick in transmitting the resolution of this House have all come to—what? They have come to this circular of May 28, 1907, and letter issued by the Department of State. Not only have we abandoned our position, but there is no need now for Russian officials to enforce at the frontier the stern edict of their Emperor; our own Secretary of State is willing to do it here for them in the Department of State, forbidding to our own citizens their passports and withholding the protection of our own Government. And why? Because, forsooth, they are Jews! What name, I ask you, is signed at the bottom of that circular? Is it the name of Nicholas II, Czar of all the Russias? No; it is the name of Elihu Root, the American Secretary of State.

Formerly the Russian consul-general in New York performed this odious duty for his imperial master—lately this Department of State did it for him. Here is what a former Secretary of State—Gresham—wrote on the subject:

It is not constitutionally within the power of this Government or any of its authorities, to apply a religious test in qualification of the equal rights of all citizens of the United States.

And that it was—impossible to acquiesce in the application of such a test, within the jurisdiction of the United States by the agents of a foreign power.

And that it was—

repugnant to the national sense.

He could not foresee that our own Department of State was so soon to perform that function for the Russian agents. Nor did Mr. Bayard, when in 1885 he wrote to Mr. Emmet as follows:

There is no law of the United States requiring a passport to state when a naturalized citizen left the country of his birth. * * * A different course might imply that the right of the foreign government to participate in or make the naturalization of its subjects conditional was acknowledged here. This it has never been and probably never will be. * * *

How could he have foreseen that twenty-three years later his prophecy would be confounded?

Mr. Speaker, I challenge the legal right of the Department of State to have issued this circular of May 28, 1907, and the accompanying letter. No precedent can be found for such an action. No law can be cited in support of it. The passport is primarily a certificate of citizenship; it is granted as a matter of right to every American citizen who chooses to apply for it. I have here a list of the cases in which passports have been denied by the Department of State to individuals upon the ground that those individuals were personally unworthy. Never a precedent where a class of citizens was excluded on account of their religious faith. I will read to the House these half dozen precedents.

Passports have been refused when the person applying for them "was hostile to the Union," or where the person was "engaged in violation of the laws of the United States," or where the person was "one of the criminal classes," or where the person was a "contumacious fugitive from justice," or where the person was an "anarchist," or a "Mormon missionary," or a person who "while abroad has a purpose to reside indefinitely in a foreign country or fails to show a reasonable intention to return to the United States."

Now, search that list of reasons for refusing a passport to American citizens, and find, if you can, the classes in which the Secretary of State would place the worthy and respectable Hebrews of America. Is it as "hostile to the Union" that he refuses them their passports? I ask you to search the lists of our military service, and that question will answer itself. Is it as "anarchists" that they are refused the passport, when they are known the world over as the most industrious and conservative of citizens?

Mr. Speaker, I deny categorically and absolutely the right of the Department of State to have issued this circular of May 28, 1907, and I deny further their pretension to make inquisition into the religious belief of an American citizen. If they can not secure for American citizens rights secured to us under our treaty, if they must make one of the sovereign rights of the American citizen conditional upon the assent of a foreign emperor, let them say so, and let them face the people upon that issue. I want to picture to you gentlemen what this means. Not only is it a matter of offense and insult to the Hebrews of the United States who are native born and who may have figured in some of the most memorable and honorable chapters of our history, but it is also applicable to a whole class of American citizens who were formerly subjects of Russia. One-eighth of the immigration to the United States nowadays is composed of Russian Jews. Not a family in Lithuania but has some near relative in the New World. Tens of thousands of them have fled from the land of oppression. A new exodus has taken place from under a taskmaster more stern and more severe than the Pharaoh Rameses. Tens of thousands of these people now far from the bayonets and shouts of the Cossacks, far from the scenes of riot, of murder and sudden death, are safely housed in our hospitable land, helping to upbuild the prosperity of us all. Shall we debar them forever from all chance of returning to the scenes of their childhood? Can we deny them the right to carry back to those whom they have left behind some message of hope for the future? Are we to deny them the right to take legal succession to property in Russia? This is inconsistent with our assertion of sovereignty. It is repugnant to our principles of national policy.

In the middle ages, throughout so-called "Christendom," the Jew was obliged to wear a ring of bright color upon his breast and upon his back, so that the children playing in the street might pause to point him out and to make mock of him. Today, in the twentieth century, in a land grown great because of our fundamental equality of religious faith, our own Department of State has affixed the Jewish badge. Down through the corridors of time comes ringing the old cry of "Hep, hep!" Shall we tolerate its echoes in our own Department of State? Shall we have the world to know that officially we have two classes of citizens, the one the Gentile and the other the Jew? That the former is the full citizen and the latter only a citizen by grace of the Secretary of State and the Emperor of Russia? Or shall we restore to the title of American citizen the glory which is its birthright?

Now, I want for a moment to take up the letter of the Secretary of State of last Saturday, which is introduced here for the purpose of blocking this inquiry. I wish to say to you gentlemen on the Republican side that this is not a partisan matter.

It has never been so treated before. You had a plank in your last national platform upon the subject, and so had we. In my service in the House I have never seen any evidence of an effort to bring the question of partisanship into the matter, and I beg you that, as it has not been so in the past, it shall not be now. I ask you to join us in saying that the Secretary of State shall not strangle by his premature and unsatisfactory answer to the resolution of inquiry asking for information that we are entitled to have. This gentleman [Mr. Root] is the most noted and skillful and successful apologist of modern times, but this is a very weak apology he has written here. He has furnished us with a circular, which, he says, has been substituted for the offensive circular. That substitution took place on the 25th of January, after the other circular had been published eight months, and after my colleague [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] had gone to the bureau of citizenship and called their attention to the words of the circular, which contained much offense, and had vigorously protested in the name of the Hebrews of America. This is no answer to the resolution of inquiry, nor does it give any reason why there should be so much mystery or sanctity thrown around a discussion of our relations with Russia. It is quite evident that nothing has been done by the Department of State since 1904.

Now, gentlemen, in the days of the old Roman Empire, the proud boast of "Civis Romanus sum" was respected throughout the civilized world, from the borders of Parthia to the Ultima Thule of Britain. I ask you to restore to Americans the glory that is theirs, so that it shall be recognized throughout the modern world that the proudest boast of our day is the statement, "I am an American citizen." [Loud applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CAPRON. Does the gentleman desire to use his time at this time?

Mr. HARRISON. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CAPRON. Then I yield such time as I have remaining to the gentleman from Illinois.

[Mr. LOWDEN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I was very much edified by the interesting disquisition that the gentleman has made upon the war of 1812, but it does not seem to me that he has covered half the question now at issue in his reply. He did not touch on the circular of May 28, 1907, which is the one really under discussion.

Mr. LOWDEN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HARRISON. I have only three minutes. The gentleman can reply in his own time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the gentleman how he can justify the Secretary of State in refusing, not only to naturalized American citizens who were formerly Russian subjects, but to all American Hebrews, the right to have a passport unless a foreign power shall give consent before the passport is issued? He has furnished a very interesting historical discourse, which has given me much useful information, but he has not answered the question at issue at all.

Now, gentlemen, I appeal to you to get an answer out of the Department of State which shall be a real answer. Why did they publish the circular of May 28, 1907? What justification had they for doing so, and why did they subsequently and secretly retract it without informing the man who had protested at the bureau of citizenship and thus had brought about this inquiry—my colleague from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE]? Why did they do it, except to forestall the resolution of inquiry? If it was right for them for eight long months to publish a circular saying that "this Department will not issue passports to former Russian subjects or to Jews who intend going to Russian territory unless it has assurance that the Russian Government will consent to their admission," why did they retract it secretly and hurriedly last week? We are entitled to know what this means. You, gentlemen, are not here merely as individuals; you are here as Represenatives of the great American people. You represent millions of Americans who are entitled to know what is going on in this matter. I tell you there was a time not very long ago when the Congress practically managed the foreign affairs of this country, but to-day, at the suggestion of the Secretary of State that it would now be indiscreet to inquire into his doings, you propose meekly to bow your heads and receive the rod. That is not American. I appeal to you, gentlemen, to put this resolution of inquiry through and get all the information that the Department of State has on the subject. [Applause.]

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURRIER). The gentleman from Rhode Island has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. CAPRON. I yield such time to the gentleman from Illinois as he desires.

[Mr. LOWDEN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the same privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a sufficient reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, my colleague on the committee, to say that the purpose of the circular from the State Department to which he referred was simply for the protection of American citizens of Russian-Jewish descent who might, if free passports were given them, get themselves into conflict and trouble with the Russian law, one sentence of which I ask permission to read from the Secretary of State's report:

> Under the present Russian law a subject who becomes a citizen of another country without the consent of the Russian Government is deemed to have committed an offense for which he is liable to arrest and punishment if he returns without previously obtaining the permission of the Russian Government.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAPRON. Considering the short time I have, it does not seem best for me to get into a discussion of international law with the gentleman from New York, who is so thoroughly versed upon that subject, and therefore I ask him to excuse me from yielding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Rhode Island declines to yield.

Mr. CAPRON. I would say that a statute of that kind standing, as has been stated, on the basis of a lack of an international treaty regarding this subject, would seem to determine the action of the House to be all sufficient; but, with the State Department in the midst of negotiations which have not been completed, and such negotiations involving the correspondence in regard to the general subject, it not yet being a settled question, I ask any intelligent gentleman in this House if he would think it wise at this time for the State Department to promulgate this tentative arrangement which has progressed so far that within a few days a circular has been issued from the Department that passports will be granted generally to anyone who applies, and will not be refused, as they have been for the past four years, because of their desire to protect naturalized citizens from any oppression that might come to them in that country where conditions are so unsettled as they are in Russia.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CAPRON. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman has something which is really unpleasant, I would like to hear it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I did not catch the remark of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. CAPRON. It is not necessary to repeat it. I have yielded, and I will be glad to answer any question that I can.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Rhode Island, who is so thoroughly conversant with the procedure of this House and the form of resolutions, especially when they relate to foreign affairs, will perhaps answer this inquiry. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOWDEN] seemed to take exception to that portion of the resolution that called upon the Secretary of State to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, as to certain things. Does not the gentleman from Rhode Island recognize the fact that that is the regular, customary, uniform way of wording a resolution?

Mr. CAPRON. The resolution or the reply?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The resolution.

Mr. CAPRON. Why certainly, and I should say that under the circumstances and from my experience covering some years, as the gentleman has said, that it ought to be the stereotyped reply to very many resolutions of this kind. I believe there is nothing more that I desire to say and I therefore move that the resolution do lie upon the table.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the privilege of unanimous consent for such gentlemen on this side of the Chamber as desire to print their remarks in the RECORD, to be accorded that privilege for the next five days.

Mr. CAPRON. I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that members have five days in which to print remarks, and to that request the gentleman from Rhode Island objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island, that the resolution do lie upon the table.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the Speaker withhold the stating of that motion for a second?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island that the resolution do lie upon the table.

The question was taken, and a division was demanded by Mr. SULZER.

The House divided, and the Speaker announced that 56 had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, to save the time of the House, I believe that we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 120, nays 101, answer "present" 7, not voting 161, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SHERMAN. For the purpose of correcting or changing a vote. My attention was distracted for the moment when my name was called, and I inadvertently voted "no." I intended to vote "aye." I see I am announced as being paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. RIORDAN], so I desire to withdraw my vote and simply state that if Mr. RIORDAN was present I should vote "aye," and he would vote "no." I desire now to vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called Mr. SHERMAN's name, and he answered "present."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," and I am paired. I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, and he answered "present."

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have my vote recorded.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would like to have my vote recorded.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was just walking on the floor of the House when my name was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not hear the gentleman.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was not in my seat; I was just walking in on the floor of the House when my name was called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman on the floor of the House and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. PATTERSON. I was not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not be recorded as voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CAPRON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON GRADES AND SALARIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress estimates for salaries in the Executive Departments and establishments prepared by the committee on grades and salaries under the Executive order of June 11, 1907.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 11, 1908.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the House resolved itself into Committe of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15219, the Indian appropriation bill, Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. Does the gentleman from New York press the point of order?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order I raised yesterday at the time the committee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York insists upon his point or order. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma wish to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not desire to resist the point of order, but I have an amendment which I think is in keeping with the wishes of the committee, and offer this as a substitute therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 14, "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, or cause to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury to the credit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians of Oklahoma an amount of money, the total of which shall not exceed $100 per capita, to the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache tribes of Indians in Oklahoma. This shall not apply as a limitation on any former powers vested in the Secretary with reference to the funds to the credit of said Indian tribes."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire, gentlemen of the committee, to state again succinctly why I offered the amendment yesterday and why I withdrew it to-day and offer in lieu thereof the amendment which I have just sent to the desk. The parties for whom this relief is asked consists of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians of southwestern Oklahoma. The lands belonging to these Indians have already, save their own allotment of 160 acres each, been recently sold and the money placed in the Treasury subject to disposition as Congress may direct.

For the past series of years the Indians of those three tribes have been paid from past annuities and other sources out of their own money, $50 each every six months. The last two payments, as I am informed by the Commissioner and likewise by the Indian chiefs, who are here in person and have presented the matter to me at length, were cut short by reason of the money not being available—their own money. Yesterday I thought, inasmuch as Congress was not at all times in session and as these payments fell due at times when Congress could not give them the relief and dictate how those funds should be paid to them as a necessity demanded them, I asked that the Secretary of the Interior be empowered to pay this money to them in installments as they needed it. It has been suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and other gentleman who are familiar with the situation that that is further than Congress would now like to go. I therefore offer the amendment that I just sent to the desk, which only permits the Secretary of the Interior to pay them now about the amount that they have failed to receive in the past to make up the usual payment they should have received at each of the former six months' payments. And I want to say as another reason why this is urgently urged that at this time the only money available for the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, even though they have a large fund in the Treasury that belongs to them as proceeds of the sale of their lands, is $13 each.

Now, the last two payments being cut short and this payment cut down to $13 works a great hardship on those three Indian tribes. I do not believe it is the disposition of this committee to ask for any technical ruling on the part of the Chair to cut them out of that relief. I said on yesterday that perhaps this is a kind of eleventh-hour concession, and perhaps this is coming at a time when I should not take the time of the committee to bring it up, but, on the contrary, should go to the committee with it in the regular way. But these people are uneducated. They can not speak English. They do not know their rights, and they do not present them in a formal way. But I take it that there should be no proper objection to this House acting now, because of the spirit and the purpose of this act, and every other appropriation act for Indians, is certainly to benefit the situation, and surely a technical reservation of a point of order should not be made against it, even though it was not properly presented. If this amendment will now be offered and be accepted and received, the Secretary of the Interior may pay over to them $100 each, which will just about make up for the amount that their payments fell short in the past, and let them have their money that is now due and which they have reason to expect they would get.

I want to say one word more, and I do not want to consume too much time, to show why it is eminently necessary that this be done. They had reason to believe by precedent and former payments that they were going to get $50 apiece at the last semiyearly payment. They did not get it. That left the Indians in debt. The recent money stringency came on, and it left them in debt in the fall of the year, and all through the winter they have been in debt; their stock has been without a sufficient amount of feed, and their children and their people are really suffering in Oklahoma to-day, with money in the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Another important reason why this should be done is that their lands have all be sold excepting their individual allotment of 160 acres each. Anyone who is familiar with the way the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache Indians have lived knows that it has not been their custom to live on their own individual allotments, but now that the other lands have been sold and taken up, it becomes necessary for them to settle and take up residence on their own individual allotments.

That being true, they need money with which to build fences, they need money with which to build houses, and they need money to buy feed. The spring of the year is coming on, and I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order against this very necessary amendment. The chiefs are here, who will corroborate everything I have said. I took them to the committee room this morning to fully bear out every word I had said, but through unfortunate circumstances, I did not get a chance to present the matter in full to the chairman of the committee, by reason of his being detained. In addition to that, as was suggested yesterday, this matter is earnestly recommended in a letter from the Department of the Interior, that was sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs on December 11 last. So it is not an entirely new matter. It is something that the Indian Commissioner wants, the Department of the Interior wants, and I believe it is a matter that justice demands on the part of the Indians.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman tell us how much there is of this fund in the Treasury that belongs to these Indians?

Mr. FERRIS. It consists of two funds. One fund is $1,500,600; the other fund is some eight hundred and sixty-odd thousand dollars; I am not sure about the last, but I am about the first; neither of which is available for the Indians.

Mr. MANN. That is the principal, and the payment is the interest on these funds?

Mr. FERRIS. The interest on the fund has been paid out to these Indians, and to such an extent that the Commissioner informed me just before convening to-day that every cent that was due would only give the Indians about $13 a piece on this payment.

Mr. MANN. How many of these Indians are there?

Mr. FERRIS. About 3,700 in the three tribes.

Mr. MANN. Three thousand seven hundred; and the interest is apportioned among them. How much does it amount to a year?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not answer the gentleman with mathematical accuracy, but the Commissioner informed me that it would only amount to $13 a piece.

Mr. MANN. But it goes to a very much wider question. These Indians, as I understand it, and the gentleman can inform me if it is not so, draw 4 per cent interest for this fund in the Treasury?

Mr. FERRIS. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. This proposition is to invade the principal? Now, these Indians have been paid, you say, out of the interest $50 semiannually?

Mr. FERRIS. That is not the interest on this fund alone, but from the sale of some lands, etc.

Mr. SHERMAN. The total interest to-day of this investment fund, money in the Treasury, is $75,031, and their income from other sources other than gratuities is $32,132; in other words, $107,000.

Mr. MANN. That is about $300 apiece.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; about $30 apiece.

Mr. FERRIS. Three thousand seven hundred of them.

Mr. MANN. And then they get the interest on this fund?

Mr. FERRIS. And that only semiyearly; yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, then, we have allotted to these Indians their lands in severalty, 160 acres; now, do you propose, after the allotment is made, that we shall support them out of their property? Is that to be the policy the gentleman advocates for his part of the country—that we shall allot the Indians their lands in severalty to the extent of a homestead of 160 acres, and then agree to pay them interest as their little current money, chicken feed, as it were, and as soon as that is done propose to invade the principal? What will they have to live on after the property is gone?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will allow me, these Indians have wild lands, and unless they can have money they can not break up these lands, and unless they break them up they can not be cultivated, and they will not be able to make their improvements and not be able to improve their situation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FULTON. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I want to say that what the Indian wants is an understanding as to what shall be done with him. The policy as to these Indian tribes has been to pay them $50 per capita semiannually. The last two payments have not amounted to $50. I do not know just exactly what the payments were. But the understanding with the Department was that these payments would regularly be $50. That is all that they ask; all they are asking now. The disposition of the Indian is such that he wants to know what he may expect. He has been given to understand that he might expect these $50 payments twice a year.

Mr. MANN. Well, but was he given to understand that this amendment proposes to give $100?

Mr. McGUIRE. That is what I am coming to. In conference with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs yesterday, his statement was that they should like to pay these Indians now enough to make $50 semiannually. That would satisfy the Indians.

Mr. MANN. Well, now, is it not a fact that they were paid $30 at the last semiannual payment?

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not know as to that; I think that was the amount.

Mr. MANN. And they were only short $20?

Mr. McGUIRE. At that one payment.

Mr. MANN. And that there is now money sufficient to pay them $13?

Mr. McGUIRE. About $13.

Mr. MANN. So that that would be $37 as the total, and here is a proposition to pay them $100.

Mr. McGUIRE. My impression is that there is another payment of $50 that they did not get in full.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may have that impression; my impression is that that is not the case.

Mr. McGUIRE. The gentleman may be right; I can not say as to that; but, Mr. Chairman, there has never been a time and will never come a time when these Indians are more in need of this money than now. They have received and taken their allotments; they are attaining civilization rapidly. They have never been able to reach a point where they could cultivate their lands; they are needing the money to make the improvements, and there never can come a time when they will be as much in need of this money as at this time.

There has been some depression there. They have exhausted their means; they have exhausted their credit; they are badly in need of this payment, and I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell us how the depression affects the community?

Mr. McGUIRE. I suppose the same way as it affects every other community.

Mr. MANN. I fail to understand how it is affecting any community in that respect.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How it affects this question.

Mr. McGUIRE. It affects the Indian as it affects everybody else.

Mr. MANN. Well, how? The money that they are entitled to is in the Treasury.

Mr. McGUIRE. These Indians have had local credit. They have been able to go to the banks and get money.

Mr. MANN. I guess that is the trouble. They have had credit, and now they are in debt, and they want the Government to advance them a part of their principal to pay their debts with, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. And it is not the Indians as much as it is the other people who are anxious about this.

Mr. McGUIRE. These Indians have not incurred an indebtedness beyond what they had a right to expect they would be able to meet. They have been securing these $50 payments, and they have had the right to expect that these payments would continue, because they had been given to understand that. Now that the payments are reduced, it is no fault of the Indian. He has incurred an indebtedness that he can not pay, and that indebtedness has destroyed his credit, and that is the condition of the Indian at this time; and I say if we ever expect to give them the money which is theirs, we should give it to them now. This money is in the Treasury of the United States; it belongs to the Indians, and they have asked for it through their representatives, and it seems to me, if we ever expect to give it to them, there is no better time than now.

Mr. MANN. Did we not enter into a treaty—not a regular treaty, but an arrangement—with them, providing how this money should be invested; that it should be put into the Treasury and that we should pay them interest on it?

Mr. McGUIRE. There is no doubt that this money is in the Treasury, but not by any treaty.

Mr. MANN. Not a regular treaty, but an arrangement.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; the gentleman from Illinois is right. We entered into an agreement with them.. Call it a treaty, or whatever it is. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the floor for a minute, the proposition here is a broad one, it seems to me as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McGUIRE] has stated. We did enter into an agreement with these Indians, by which they parted with the title to their lands, and we did undertake to dispose of the lands for the Indians. Some of them have been disposed of and some of them not. The various members of the tribes have taken allotments. We have disposed of part of their lands, which have not yet all been paid for. The agreement provided that a portion of the money derived should be distributed in per capita payments to the Indians, which has been done. It provided further that a million and a half dollars should be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of these Indians and that they should receive 5 per cent interest. More money, however, has been derived from the sale of these lands than the most optimistic had ever dared to expect, so that there has already been paid in for the benefit of these Indians more than the million and a half dollars which we agreed to keep for them and pay them 5 per cent interest on and more than the amount that was distributed per capita. Now the condition is present, as the Commissioner of Indian Affairs told me to-day, where these Indians are in need of some of the principal of their own money to help them out in building homes, and in breaking up the soil, and in preparing to make their allotments productive. They are here themselves, by representatives of the tribe, asking that a certain portion of the money be paid to them. What they ask is $100 per capita to be distributed, amounting to between $300,000 and $400,000. It is a question with us now whether we shall recognize the fact that these particular Indians are in need of the use of some of their principal, which is an amount in excess of the amount we originally contemplated would be in the Treasury for their benefit. I hope I make myself clear.

Mr. MANN. I get the distinction, but I think very few people will ever get it, if the precedent is once established, I will say to the gentleman. We get the distinction under his magnetic influence now.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; we have done the same thing for other Indians, and I trust we will again. I am not one of those who, like my distinguished friend from Iowa, Mr. Lacey, in the last Congress, was in favor of providing for the distribution of the thirty-odd million dollars of principal of the trust funds to the Indians and get rid of this fund.

I did not favor that bill then, and I do not favor it now. I did not favor distributing the entire proceeds of this trust fund to various tribes per capita. I did think it was wise to vest authority in the Secretary to pay to the individual Indian his proportion of the trust fund deposited in the Treasury when he had demonstrated his capacity to care for his own property, but that is not here.

This is not establishing a precedent. We have heretofore paid the Indians a portion of the principal fund which was in the Treasury to their credit when the conditions arose which demonstrated that it was for the best interest of the Indians that it should be done at a particular time. Now, the administrative part of the Government, who are more familiar with the business there than I am—I do not know that they are more familiar than is my colleague from Oklahoma—but they are more familiar than am I or the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman from Illinois is talking for a principle, as I understand—the Department urges me to-day most strongly to favor this proposition upon the ground that it is for the present best interests of these particular tribes and, as the Commissioner believes, for their ultimate good.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from New York a further question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Are these the only tribes where this proposition is to be made?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is not in the bill a provision, but somebody suggested to me that they might perhaps offer an amendment to distribute the principal fund to the Sac and Fox Indians and the Iowas, but there is nothing in the bill to that effect, and I do not know that the amendment will be offered.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think this precedent will not involve us in trouble?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not a precedent. It is not a precedent unless doing the same thing over and over and over again is re-establishing a precedent. This precedent, as the gentleman calls it, has already been established; we have heretofore been doing the same thing.

Mr. MANN. Dividing up the Indian fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the whole fund.

Mr. MANN. The partial fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have heretofore paid the Indian tribes a portion of their trust funds when conditions have arisen that Congress believed warranted such action.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe that if the land had not sold for a high price and made the Indians hungry for money there would have been anybody here asking for that money?

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps not; but if not, there would be many people here asking us to increase by a large measure the gratuity which we give the Indians. We formerly granted to these Indians as a gratuity a sum much larger than we have been doing of late.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why are they in such a bad condition?

Mr. MANN. I thought these Indians were all rich.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are comparatively rich. Here is in the neighborhood of $3,000,000 to be divided among 3,800 Indians. I do not know what their measure of wealth is, but I think a per capita of $1,000 is pretty large.

Mr. MANN. Each one has a homestead?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And unallotted lands besides?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; no unallotted lands. Those have been sold, and that is where this money comes from.

Mr. MANN. Somebody said that there was a lot more of unallotted land.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is error.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell me why the Indians are in this bad financial condition?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not in any deplorable condition. They have accepted allotment, and it is hoped they will work out the allotment until they have made farms and built little homes on them. I sometimes get tired, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman never looks it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the gentleman. I was going to say that I sometimes get tired at the suggestions made here that the Indian is such a miserable creature. Why, I have seen thousands and thousands of white men in my own State that I would trade off in a minute for a half a dozen Indians. [Laughter.] There are some Indians that are no good, the same as a lot of white people that are no good, but the gentleman from Tennessee must understand that we have to be helping white people all the while. Every county in his own State maintains a poorhouse. How many times has the gentleman personally been called on by his constituents to put his hand down in his pocket and help a man out to buy a plow or rethatch a church? [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman does not want me to take up the balance of the session, does he? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. As soon as I get through with the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am on the side of the Indians. I never have thought that we treated them exactly right. It seems to me from what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has said that the Indian now needs some money. I can see that, and I am talking seriously. What do we have? We have, first, the banks all shut down as against the Indian and the white man, too, and not only that, but the Indians have the Treasury doors shut against them. The gentleman from Oklahoma and his colleague [Mr. McGUIRE] have said that they now need money—to do what? To buy seed and to buy farm machinery. What I am trying to elucidate is this: Is their condition now such as that the Government should do something unusual, extraordinary, but of course not unwise?

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, this is not unusual or extraordinary other than that we are going to give them some of their own money instead of taking money out of the Treasury of the United States for their assistance.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, if they have not enough seed or can not get any seed to go to farming, and they have money here—trust funds—we certainly ought to give them their money.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, that is what we are trying to do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Or let the Secretary of Agriculture send them out some seed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, that is what we are trying to do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I am for it. [Laughter.] I am glad that we have struck seed, Mr. Chairman, and I hope it will not be "wild oats."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a further inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I would like to know whether this hundred dollars is all principal or part principal and part interest, and whether the intention is to pay them more than they have usually been getting?

Mr. FERRIS. I believe, in response to the gentleman's question, that I can state the facts. The situation is this: Their regular six months' payment, their semiannual payment, is now due in February. Next fall, next September, when the next payment comes due, this Congress will not be in session, and, as the gentleman will note, my amendment does not seek to give the Secretary any authority other than to make this payment for them. He will then leave any little accumulations of interest that may be to try and come as near as possible to making their usual payment next September, when there is no one to appeal to who will be able to help him out.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman satisfied that they will not construe this as a precedent as to the amounts that they are to receive? Heretofore they concluded they were to have $50 every time because they got it the first time. Will they not now think that they are to get $100 every time?

Mr. FERRIS. Of course I can not answer that question. I can only say that for the past six years, from their pasture annuities and their rentals and grass money, and other little items that they have accumulated on their public lands, which have since been sold, they have been able to pay them $50 semiyearly. At the last payment they were not able to do this, and that leaves them in a deplorable condition, and they ask to have enough of their own money to start them off on their allotments.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we now go back and dispose of the two little matters we passed over informally, with the agreement to go back. I ask to go back to page 18, and I offer the following amendment to follow line 9, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Insert after line 18 on page 18:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Rebok & Cramer, a copartnership composed of Philip K. Rebok and Hiram W. Cramer, of Toledo, Iowa, the sum of $716, found due them by the Secretary of the Interior under contract dated October 2, 1905, for construction of laundry building and water system at the Sac and Fox Indian School, Iowa, under the appropriation heretofore made for said purpose."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make an explanation. In 1905 a provision was made for certain additions at this agency and contracts were let for various improvements, and amongst other contracts a contract with these gentlemen named in the amendment amounting to considerably over $3,000, was made for a water supply. The bids were accepted on the 7th day of September, but the contract was not forwarded to the bidders until the 7th of October and was not approved by the Secretary until the 24th of October, although the contract provided that the work should be completed by the 1st of December. The contractors immediately communicated with the Indian Office, asking if the penalty embraced in the contract, $6 a day, would be enforced if the work was not completed in time. The Indian Office replied for them to go ahead as fast as they could and that all the conditions would be considered at the time of settlement. The contractors did not finish their work until one hundred and thirty-odd days after the 1st of December. At the time of settlement there was deducted from the amount due $816, or $6 a day, for the time they were behind. They accepted the money which was sent and then protested to the Department, calling their attention to the letters which were written, etc., and the Department at once said, Why, this was a mistake; that a hundred dollars was all they ought to have retained from this contract price to cover any possible loss that could have been occasioned the Government by reason of this failure to comply with the contract.

Mr. MANN. I am satisfied.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very good. The gentleman from Illinois states he is satisfied with the explanation. This is to pay, not the full amount, but the amount less the $100 which the Department states should have been retained. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is waived. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will turn to page 21, lines 8 and 9, there was an error made in the printing of the bill which gave rise to the discussion the other day and to the misunderstanding. The item should be "to complete a drainage survey," not "drainage and survey," but inasmuch as there is no provision here for reimbursement, I have redrawn the provision and I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, to take the place of lines 8 and 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21 strike out lines 8 and 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"To complete the drainage survey provided for under the act of June 21, 1906, $10,000: Provided, That said amount shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the funds in the Treasury belonging to said Indians derived from the sale of lands under the act of January 14, 1889."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is pending against the language on page 21, lines 8 and 9, which is clearly subject to the point of order in the language in which it is framed, which is explained to be a mistake, so the point of order might as well be sustained and then the gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very good.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the point of order is sustained and the gentleman from New York offers an amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue a patent to the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions for the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 6, township 28 north, range 24 east of the Indian meridian, Indian Territory, the same having been set apart to the Roman Catholic Church for church and school purposes by the Quapaw National Council, on August 24, 1893, and said church having maintained a church and school thereon since that date.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment is at the end of line 10, page 34.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue a patent to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America for and covering the following-described lands, amounting to approximately 160 acres, now and for many years reserved for and occupied by the said board of missions as an Indian school, to wit: The northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 1 south, range 1 west of the Wind River meridian, on the Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming: Provided, That the said patent shall not issue until the Indians of the said reservation have given their consent to the grant through their business committee or council in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall provide.

Mr. SHERMAN. I raise the point of order that this amendment is not germane to this portion of the bill. We are now under the State of Oklahoma. The amendment should be offered when we reach Montana.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the merits of the amendment, then.

Mr. MONDELL. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman, for the present.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $200,000, at 5 per cent, per second article of treaty of October 21, 1837, $10,000.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, in lieu of lines 1, 2, and 3, insert:
"And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay per capita to the Sac and Foxes of the Mississippi tribe of Indians in the State of Oklahoma the balance of the Sac and Fox of the Mississippi and Oklahoma trust fund now to their credit in the United States Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is one passed upon by the committee. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and it is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. The Sac and Foxes are Indians in an advanced state of civilization. I think they have about $800,000 besides this $200,000 which comes from the sale of their lands. My judgment is, in view of the state of civilization attained by these Indians, they ought to be paid all their money. They would be better citizens if they had all their money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is a dispute about the ownership of this money, is there not?

Mr. McGUIRE. As to the Sac and Foxes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. McGUIRE. Well, there is some dispute between the Indians in Oklahoma and the Indians in Iowa.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And there is some litigation pending as to the disposition of that fund?

Mr. McGUIRE. As to a certain amount of money, but there is, I think, about $800,000 left after this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is the claim of the Sac and Foxes of the State of Iowa is much in excess of the amount of money that would be left if this money is distributed.

Mr. McGUIRE. If the gentleman will pardon me, he is mistaken, I think, about that. There is about $800,000 left, I am advised.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I may be mistaken. It is some time since I refreshed my recollection, but will the gentleman state the amount involved in this litigation between the Iowa Sac and Fox Indians and the Oklahoma Sac and Fox Indians?

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not remember just at the moment, but my recollection is it is about $300,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It seems to me that my recollection is equally as good as the gentleman's recollection.

Mr. McGUIRE. I think perhaps that is true. I do not know why it should not be. I am not disputing the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Until I have an opportunity to satisfy myself on my own investigation I shall insist upon the point of order.

Mr. McGUIRE. Then, Mr. Chairman, may this be passed until the gentleman from New York has an opportunity to investigate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I imagine that this bill will be enacted into law by that time.

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not know how long it would take the gentleman to investigate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure, I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma; except I will say that items of this character on these appropriation bills should be in the bills, so that Members will have an opportunity to investigate them at their leisure and not be compelled to devote time they desire to utilize in other ways in attempting to straighten out their recollection.

Mr. McGUIRE. I desire to say it is no fault of the Indians. They ought to have the money. It is theirs by right. It is held only in trust by the Government of the United States. They would be better Indians and better citizens if they had all their money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a great difference of opinion as to whether they should have it or not. I am of this opinion, based upon my investigations, that when we finish dividing the trust funds of the Indians we will then support them out of the general funds in the Treasury.

Mr. McGUIRE. I ask the gentleman if he knows anything about the Sac and Fox Indians of Oklahoma? They are good farmers in the adjoining county to the one in which I live.

Mr. MANN. If they are good farmers, what do they want with the money?

Mr. McGUIRE. What does anybody need their money for, whether red or white?

Mr. MANN. If they are good farmers, why do they need this money?

Mr. McGUIRE. Because they are entitled to it.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a question as to whether they are entitled to it or not?

Mr. McGUIRE. They are entitled to it under the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McGUIRE. It is held by the Government of the United States in trust for them. This money was received for lands sold by these Indians, and this was by their treaty left with the Government until they called for it, and they call for it now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is clearly mistaken.

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not know whether that is so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This money was left with the Government to be utilized for the benefit of the Indians as the Government thought best.

Mr. McGUIRE. Under treaty stipulation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nobody would ever contend that the ward of a guardian has the right to demand the money that is held in trust for him. Now, I would not be willing to have a fund of $200,000 distributed among Indians until at least a careful investigation has been made as to all the conditions surrounding the distribution.

Mr. McGUIRE. But I will say that in this case a careful investigation has been made by the Interior Department, and I am perfectly conversant with the situation there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman may be correct that the Interior Department has made a careful investigation, but the gentleman certainly does not mean to say that he has made an investigation recently. I have been interested in the various claims to this fund. My recollection is not very fresh about it, as it is some years since I looked into the matter. The gentleman says he has made a thorough investigation of the matter. His recollection is not very keen. I admit that I have not looked into it for about four years. I can say to the gentleman that I have seen, personally, some of the Sac and Fox Indians in Oklahoma and have seen what they have been doing.

Mr. McGUIRE. The gentleman has made a trip through Oklahoma?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes.

Mr. McGUIRE. How many times has he been there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Only once.

Mr. McGUIRE. How long has it been; how long since you were there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Seven years.

Mr. McGUIRE. Does the gentleman know that he saw any of the Sac and Fox Indians?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I saw them on that trip; maybe not in the State, but in some parts where I was. I am willing to confess that my recollection may be at fault; that I can not recall the facts with great accuracy; it may be that the gentleman is in the same position.

Mr. McGUIRE. I am very glad the gentleman has such a clear conception of my knowledge of the condition of these Indians and their requirements. There are some things I confess in reference to the amount of the money that is claimed by the Iowa Sac and Fox. I may not have a correct recollection as to the amount of the claim of the Sac and Fox of Iowa against these Indians, or the amount in dispute, but I am ready to say at this time that it is by no means what these Indians have in the Treasury of the United States held in trust for them, and that there is an abundance of money left if this appropriation is made to satisfy any debt or any claim the Iowa Sac and Fox may have against the Oklahoma Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there any litigation pending for this fund? I believe there is a litigation of the Sac and Fox of Iowa, and as I understand they have been turned down by the Department. In what court is that litigation pending?

Mr. McGUIRE. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And what is the amount involved?

Mr. McGUIRE. I think about $300,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would that interfere with what you are asking here?

Mr. McGUIRE. It would not interfere in any way with the amount we are asking for here.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma care to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $800,000, at 5 per cent, per second article of treaty of October 11, 1842, $40,000: Provided, That the sum of $1,500 of this amount shall be used for the pay of a physician and for purchase of medicine;

In all, $51,000.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 10, page 36, insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay per capita to the Iowa tribe of Indians in the States of Kansas and Oklahoma, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the balance of the Iowa trust fund in the United States Treasury: Provided, That the Oklahoma branch of Iowas shall receive such an amount of this trust fund as will equalize for them the payment made to the Kansas branch under the act approved May 27, 1902 (32 Stat. L., 267)."

Mr FITZGERALD. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, this is a committee amendment, passed unanimously by the committee and recommended by the Secretary of the Interior.

The large majority of these Iowa Indians,I think eighty-eight in number, are good farmers. They desire the rest of their money. I think this includes all the money held in trust by the Government of the United States for them.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the amount of money?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, of course, is well aware that members of the committee can not tell by hearing an amendment of that sort read—at least, I can not—what it means. Will the gentleman tell us? That is one trouble about offering these amendments without having them printed.

Mr. TAWNEY. I should like to have the gentleman answer the question I asked him as to the amount of the trust fund that remains in the possession of the Government.

Mr. McGUIRE. The amount of it is $78,000. This is recommended by the Interior Department.

Mr. MANN. What is it that is recommended? I could not tell by hearing the amendment read.

Mr. McGUIRE. The amendment provides for giving these Indians the $78,000 yet remaining in the Treasury of the United States, dividing it in severalty among them.

Mr. MANN. What Indians?

Mr. McGUIRE. The Iowa Indians in Oklahoma. There are only eighty-eight of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. This fund is rather different from the one we passed a moment ago.

Mr. MANN. Has this any relation to the other?

Mr. SHERMAN. None at all. The fund that the gentleman has reference to has already been capitalized. It requires no appropriation at all. The other fund did. This proposition—if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will give me his attention, as I understand he is interested in this—is not to capitalize the fund. This is a fund that has already been capitalized, and the proposition of the gentleman from Oklahoma is to distribute the fund that has been capitalized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is utterly impossible to ascertain what it is from the reading of the amendment. It provides for the equalization of payments and many other things. I am inclined to feel that, as a Member of the House, I am entitled to an opportunity to know what is proposed to be done with these funds, and I intend to make an effort to investigate them to my own satisfaction. If these items were presented to the Committee on Indian Affairs in time, in a proper way, and the committee passed on them unanimously, they would be in this bill, and Members of the House would have ample opportunity to investigate and satisfy themselves. Unless Members take the precaution to give such opportunities they may have to suffer the disadvantage of having their items go over until Members can investigate them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make the point of order? The gentleman has already reserved the point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the discussion has ended, I make the point of order.

Mr. McGUIRE. I have no disposition to discuss it further if the gentleman is going to insist on his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerical work and labor connected with the leasing of Creek and Cherokee lands, for mineral and other purposes, and the leasing of lands of full-blood Indians under the act of April 26, 1906, $40,000: Provided, That the sum so expended shall be reimbursable out of the proceeds of such leases and shall be equitably apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior from the moneys collected from such leases.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the proviso beginning in line 23 and extending to the end of line 26 on the ground that it is new legislation and contains a change of existing law and the treaty with the tribes. I make it as to the entire proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that can not go out on a point of order. We are proposing here to appropriate, to do certain work for the benefit of certain Indians, certain funds that are to come into our hands for these Indians. We are to be the trustee for them. We are acting for them. Now, we propose to do certain work for them and to advance the money to do that work with, and when the work is completed to reimburse ourselves out of the money that comes from that fund. I do not quite see upon what theory the gentleman figures that that proviso is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would like to ask the gentleman if in the act of Congress providing that the full bloods could lease their lands with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, if that same act does not provide that the Government shall furnish the machinery without taking any money from any fund for that purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. There was no such specific provision or agreement whatever.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Does not the law say that it shall be done with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Does it not appropriate money of the Government to put it in force?

Mr. SHERMAN. To start the machinery, it does.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Does the gentleman believe that it is right or fair or equitable to take from the lessors the royalty that may come into the hands of the Indian agent, royalties derived from the development of the property, to pay the clerical force for leasing the land?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is fair, and I usually look at all these matters from the point of view of the Indian. My leaning is toward the Indian and against the Government so far as the expenditures in their behalf are concerned; but I do think it is fair, after we have expended hundreds of thousands of dollars, aye, a million dollars, for the benefit of these Indians down in the Territory, after we have brought conditions down there to a higher state than they were ever in before, after we have cared for the Indians, provided a force covering a period of more than a dozen years to perfect allotments to them and assisted them in every way, in the way of schooling and all that—I do think it is fair that now we should provide that some portion of this be refunded to the United States. My only regret is that we have not long ago provided that a part of this expenditure for the Territory should be reimbursable to the Treasury.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Let me ask the gentleman if from the beginning of the treaty of 1833 up to the present time there has ever been a dollar expended for either of the Five Civilized Tribes that was not carried in the original agreement with them for the sale of lands east of the Mississippi?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, the gentleman covers a whole lot of time about which I can not speak, but I know we have expended money amounting to more than a million dollars for these Indians that was not provided directly and specifically by any treaty obligations.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Will the gentleman state for the information of the House in what branch of the department it was spent?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, if I may have a minute or two. Fifteen years ago we found a situation in the Indian Territory which was deplorable. We found that a condition of disorder and unrest was prevalent; that crime was rampant; that debauchery, fraud, and corruption were prevalent on every hand. We found there a Territory with Indians on thousands of acres of the most fertile land within the boundaries of the United States; lands that produced oil and coal and minerals and lumber, producing almost anything that you could produce on the most fertile soil in this country, and peopled by these so-called "civilized Indians."

We found it was necessary to step in and no longer let this situation blot our civilization. We found we could not longer tolerate that condition of things which stood as a wall opposing progress. Before I had anything to do with Indian affairs Congress saw fit to provide for a Commission for the Five Civilized Tribes, early known as the "Dawes Commission." That Commission proceeded to the Territory and for a half dozen years or less made every attempt to negotiate treaties with the various tribes, and they, of their own volition or misguided by their white brothers who had come in there to feed off their ill-gotten gains from the Indians, blocked every attempt to negotiate treaties with them. Then Congress, finally taking the position that it had the right to legislate in any matter wherein the best interests of the Indians were at stake, legislated in reference to breaking up the tribal relations and allotting the land down there to the individual members of the several tribes, and when finally those tribes discovered that the strong arm of the Government was raised, that they no longer could continue their career of debauchery and crime, which reached to the extent of corruption, even to the selling of their own rights—selling rights which were of great value for trifling sums in cash; when they discovered that the Government was determined to wipe out that pest hole, then the Five Civilized Tribes finally, in 1898, entered into agreements with the United States Government.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Will the gentleman answer me this question——

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. I had not got through, but I am always ready to stop.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I want to ask the gentleman if there was an acre of land held by any of the Five Civilized Tribes when the original act was passed in 1893 that was not directly bought and paid for by their having sold lands in the Eastern and Southeastern States.

Mr. SHERMAN. They had title to all the 6,000,000 acres of land in the Territory. There is no question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 16882) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], I desire to reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas reserves all points of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I shall call up the bill immediately upon the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill now under consideration.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I wish in that connection to give notice that my former notice with reference to taking up the pension appropriation bill at the conclusion of the hearing of the bill now under consideration is withdrawn, so that the pension appropriation bill will not be taken up until later.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, we entered into agreements with the several tribes in 1898. We passed what has been called the "Curtis Act," providing that allotments be made to the Indians of the various tribes, providing that prior to those allotments we should determine who were the citizens of the various tribes entitled to share in the lands and in the funds of these Indians. We had made one or two supplementary agreements with the Indians, and we had proceeded through the proper administrative offices to change the situation in the Territory, so that we made it possible a year ago to add another star, to admit a new State to the Union, which never could have been done until conditions were absolutely changed from what they were when we entered the Territory in 1893. In doing all this, Mr. Chairman, we have expended almost two and a half millions of dollars, of which a trifling sum has been reimbursable to the Treasury of the United States. The work had progressed so far that two years ago we thought it possible to dispense with the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, and that was done. Changed conditions, made necessary by reason of added legislation and court decisions, induced us to extend the statutory provisions under which the Five Civilized Tribes Commission had theretofore acted, and these same provisions apply under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who was authorized to appoint a single Commissioner, and the work has been continued down to the present time.

So that to-day we have completed allotments to the tribe called the "Seminole tribe." We have done a majority part of the work necessary to allot for all the other tribes in the Territory—the other four tribes. A surplus of lands will exist amongst all the tribes save the Seminoles after allotment has been made to all the Indians. Provision has been made for the disposal of this surplus land. Allotment to the individual members of the various tribes has been equalized in value, and provision has been made that at the conclusion of allotment the balance of the land be sold, and that then all allottees shall have their allotments equalized. In other words, I should have said all lands have been or will be appraised, and any Indian whose allotment of 160 acres is worth $4,000, for instance, must have taken from his proportion of the trust funds enough so that that will be reduced to the general equalization valuation of an allotment. That work is now in progress. It will take from one to two years more, possibly three, to complete that work. Two or three years ago we passed the high-water mark of appropriation for this Service. This year the appropriation carried in the pending bill is less than one-half what it was two or three years ago.

Next year, I am glad to say, the appropriation may again be cut in two, and that not to exceed two more bills will carry any appropriation for this work in all human probability, and the question now raised by the gentleman from Oklahoma is that all of this labor, covering more than a decade, after the expenditure of two and a half million dollars for the benefit of these various tribes, the suggestion the gentleman from Oklahoma makes is that we are committing an outrage by providing that this sum of $40,000 be reimbursed from the sale of the surplus lands after allotments are concluded.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether that provision, if right and justice should enter into it, should not provide it may be reimbursed by charging a definite sum against the lessor and the lessee both. There are thousands of leases——

Mr. SHERMAN. It is to be reimbursed out of the surplus funds; it is not to be charged against the individual.

Mr. DAVENPORT. But, my dear sir, it is, and I can show where since June last they have collected more than $30,000—where they have paid the fiddler, so to speak——

Mr. SHERMAN. And they danced while they were paying.

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir; they had the other man's hand down in their pockets while they were paying.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think they have danced for a half dozen years at our expense, and I think it is time some portion should be reimbursed to the Treasury.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. The gentleman and myself disagree upon that. I would like to ask the gentleman if you will report this as new legislation? I will be glad enough to discuss the question intelligently with you upon the floor of this House as to whether it has been at the expense of the Government of the United States or of the civilized tribes in that country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, it is not new legislation. This is a provision in reference to a sum which is appropriated for expenditures during the next fiscal year, and that is all there is of it. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I am willing.

The CHAIRMAN. Before ruling, because the question is of some embarrassment, owing to certain circumstances to which it is not necessary to allude, I will ask the chairman of the committee for some information. As I understand, the question is this. The embarrassment of the Chair is in determining exactly what existing law is. There was, as the Chair understands, passed in 1906 a statute which authorized the Indians to lease certain lands. That is correct, as the Chair understands it. If I make any misstatement, I hope the chairman of the committee will correct me.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The Chair is correct; it was April 26, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN. That authorized the Indians to lease these lands, but the Chair does not find in that bill any provision directing or authorizing the Government to be at the expense of that leasing, and furnish either the clerical work or labor. So the provision, to the Chair, seems to be merely an authorization by which the Indians could at their own trouble and at their own expense go on and make leases. Is that what the gentleman from Oklahoma understands the situation to be?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I beg the Chair's pardon. I did not understand the question.

The CHAIRMAN. That the law of 1906 merely authorizes the Indians themselves to make leases of this character?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is the contention under the act of June 28, 1898, commonly known as the "Curtis Act," whereby it was provided that under certain conditions they might lease their holdings in that country.

The CHAIRMAN. The present bill, instead of leaving the Indians to do that themselves, makes an appropriation of the sum of $40,000 to pay the expenses of the work, the Government appearing and doing the work itself, and imposing as a condition that if the Government pays that expense the Government shall be repaid. Wherein does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT] claim that that changes the existing law? What change does that make in the law which is now on the statute book?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I make two contentions. If it does change the Curtis bill and the act of 1906, which provided it might be done with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, then it is new legislation, appropriating money, and therefore has no business in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It refers simply to an appropriation for the next fiscal year. It is not continuous. It has reference simply to this one appropriation.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is an appropriation each year, and there is no law back of it to authorize it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT] is not making a point of order to the entire provision?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Only to that portion of the bill that enacts to appropriate the money of the lessors to pay the expense of the entire work of that clerical force.

The CHAIRMAN. He does not object to the Government advancing the money? He only objects to the Government being repaid for the advance?

Mr. DAVENPORT. If the Chair will excuse me, I have not gotten that far yet. When we get that far I will——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is asking for information now.

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; I do not at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Chair has before him the act of 1906?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but we have not the Curtis bill to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. SHERMAN (reading): "After the approval of this act, and so forth, leases and contracts shall be made in certain ways, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be absolutely void and of no effect without such approval."

The CHAIRMAN. Now, of course, that does not say how the expenses in connection with these leases are to be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. DAVENPORT. If the Chair will permit me, I will make this suggestion. Indeed, it does not, because there is a general appropriation each year, and has been ever since we had a Secretary of the Interior, to meet the expenses of his office and of his clerical force.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] claim that under the law as it is in force to-day the Secretary of the Interior, if he incurred these expenses, would have any right to take the amount thus spent out of the moneys received from the leases?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not without authority from the Congress so to do; no.

The CHAIRMAN. Then how does the gentleman claim that that does not change the law now existing?

Mr. SHERMAN. But, Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriation simply for the coming fiscal year. That is all. And we appropriate for next year for certain work to be done. And then we say, "Done during that year," practically as a limitation on the appropriation, that the money so expended shall be reimbursed to the Treasury from the proceeds derived from the leases over which the Secretary of the Interior has exercised supervisory power.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has the Government any control over the proceeds of these leases?

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. MANN. Then here we are taking control over them.

Mr. SHERMAN. We are reimbursing ourselves from the funds derived from a certain process for work which we have undertaken to do as a part of the process.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but we do some work for the man voluntarily and then take our pay out of the money that passes through our hands that belongs to him. If that does not change the law I do not know what would.

Mr. FLOYD. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will.

Mr. FLOYD. Is there any provision in the annual appropriation bill providing that the Government shall be reimbursed in the same way as provided in this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I think so. I want to see positively. Let me look for one moment. Yes; in the last appropriation bill there was precisely this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that found?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is on page 36 of the law—the Indian appropriation act passed in 1907 and expiring the 1st of July next.

The CHAIRMAN. What section does the gentleman read from?

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, it is the section just precisely as this is. I will send it to the Chair in just a second. The Clerk will hand it to the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York think that provision changing the law last year would extend over to the law of the present year?

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from New York suggested the other day to the Chair that various Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole had so ruled heretofore, but the present occupant the other day held it different.

The CHAIRMAN. In reference to the particular case the present occupant of the chair ruled on the other day the Chair feels very confident, but the present one is very embarrassing. The gentleman claims no authority of law except such as the clause contained in the bill of last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I claim no other provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair is ready to rule, and though he is very loath himself to so rule, yet, after consultation with a gentleman who is an excellent authority and who seems to be very clear, the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerical work and labor connected with the sale of inherited and other lands, Five Civilized Tribes, $15,000: Provided, That the sum so expended shall be reimbursable out of the proceeds of such land sales, and shall be equitably apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior from the moneys collected from such sales.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I desire to make the point of order on the proviso, commencing with the word "Provided," in line 3.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask the gentleman if he would like to strike out the whole provision?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir; but I want the proviso stricken out, and I will answer the gentleman by saying that we do not want the Secretary of the Interior to be permitted to go on and sell these inherited lands, because we have courts of equity and of law where they are just as competent to take care of the interests of these people as the Secretary of the Interior, who is 1,600 miles away.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we have already provided the terms under which these lands shall be disposed of, and we have already placed that under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I claim that they should have their affairs administered as any other American citizen would have in the courts that are there established.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I assume the Chairman's ruling will be the same as on the last proviso, and I shall not attempt now to induce him to change his opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the provisions of the act approved April 21, 1904, for the removal of restrictions upon the alienation of lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, $25,000: Provided, That so much as may be necessary may be used in the employment of clerical force in the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, there are no clerks now employed in the Indian Office under this proviso, and I do not know that any will be.

Mr. MANN. Then I make the point of order upon the proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall concede that the point of order is well taken, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such contract as in his judgment seems advisable for the care of orphan Indian children of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for the purpose of carrying this provision into effect the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as is necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, and I desire to state that the amendment is subject to the point of order, but I hope it will not be made, for the reason that a great many people are entitled to citizenship, and they could possibly, by a continuance of the acts of August 15, 1894, and June 30, 1895, have their names restored to the rolls. A great many of them have already obtained judgment in the courts of the Indian Territory. These judgments have been stricken from the rolls by the court recently appointed and known as the "citizenship court," and therefore I desire to offer this amendment for the purpose of placing these individuals back on the rolls.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to lose any rights by having the amendment debated before it is presented.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the gentleman from the Iroquois tribe of Chicago would make the objection to the amendment, and if not he, the chief from Tammany would.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, at end of line 9, page 38, by adding the following, viz:

"That the provisions of an act approved February 6, 1901 (chapter 217, United States Statutes at Large, Fifty-sixth Congress), entitled 'An act amending the act of August 15, 1894, entitled "An act making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaties and stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes,"' be, and the same is hereby, extended to any person claiming any right in the common property of the Choctaw or Chickasaw Indians or tribes; and in order to make said act applicable to any person claiming any such right in said property said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That all persons who are in whole or in part of Choctaw or Chickasaw blood or descent, and who are entitled to share in the common property of the Choctaw or Chickasaw Indians under any treaty with said Indians or law of Congress, or who claim to be so entitled under any treaty, grant, agreement, or act of Congress, or who claim to have been unlawfully denied or excluded from participating in the common property of the Choctaws or Chickasaws to which they claim to be lawfully entitled by virtue of any treaty, grant, agreement, or act of Congress, may commence and prosecute or defend any action, suit, or proceeding in relation to their right thereto in the proper district or circuit court of the United States; and said district and circuit courts are hereby given jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine any action, suit, or proceeding arising within their respective jurisdiction and involving the right of any person, in whole or in part of Indian blood or descent, to share in the common property of said Choctaw or Chickasaw Indians under any treaty, grant, agreement, or law of Congress (and in said suit the parties thereto shall be the claimant as plaintiff, and the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations or tribes jointly as party defendant); and the judgment or decree of any such court in favor of any claimant to share in the common property of said tribes shall have the same effect, when properly certified to the Secretary of the Interior, as if such judgment or decree had been allowed and approved by him: Provided, That the right of appeal shall be allowed to either party as in other cases, and that no act of Congress or agreement limiting the time in which an application or assertion of right should be made shall operate to defeat the rights of any person entitled to share in the said common property under any treaty with or grant to said Indians.

"SEC. 3. That the plaintiff shall cause a copy of his petition, filed under the preceding section, to be served upon the district attorney of the United States in the district wherein suit is brought, and shall mail copies of same, by registered letters, to the principal chief or governor of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, and shall thereupon cause to be filed with the clerk of the court wherein suit is instituted an affidavit of such service and the mailing of such letters. It shall be the duty of the district attorney upon whom service of petition is made as aforesaid to appear and defend the interests of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in the suit, and within sixty days after the service of petition upon him, unless the time should be extended by order of the court made in the case, to file a plea, answer, or demurrer on the part of the Indian governments or tribes, and to file a notice of any counter claim, set-off, claim for damages, or other demand or defense whatsoever in the premises: Provided, That should the district attorney neglect or refuse to file the plea, answer, demurrer, or defense, as required, the plaintiff may proceed with the case under such rules as the court may adopt in the premises; but the plaintiff shall not have judgment or decree for his claim, or any part thereof, unless he shall establish the same by proof satisfactory to the court.

"SEC. 4. That whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court in which the proceedings has been instituted that there is in the possession of any Department of the Government or of any bureau, division, or commission thereof or thereunder, any record or records material to the proper determination of the issue being heard, or about to be heard, the head of the Department in which such record is kept shall, upon request of the judge of said court, transmit a certified copy of the record or records on file in his Department to the clerk of the court to be used at the trial of the case without any charge therefor: Provided further, That all records in the possession or custody of any Government officer or Department or division, bureau, or commission thereof or thereunder pertaining or appertaining to the rights of any such claimant shall, upon request of the claimant or his authorized attorney, be open to inspection: Provided further, That all suits brought under the provisions of this act shall be commenced within six months after the passage of this act, and the court, upon the request of either the plaintiff or defendant, shall advance any suit instituted under the provisions of this act on the dockets thereof to as early hearing as is consistent with the rights of the parties and the interests involved."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against the amendment. It is a sweeping legislative provision. I think it requires no argument to convince the Chair that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to file a brief and argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is identical with a bill introduced by me in this Congress, H. R. 15649, The object of the bill is to afford an opportunity to about 10,000 persons, admittedly of Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian blood and descent, and who allege that they have a vested right in the common property of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians by reason of their Indian blood and descent, but have been denied their property rights by administrative officers charged by law with the duty of ascertaining their Indian blood and descent and determining their rights through:

1. Error of law;
2. Gross mistake of fact;
3. Fraud committed by said administrative officers to secure the benefits of the Act of Congress approved February 6, 1901, and which act is now in force in every State in the Union, and applicable to every Indian claimant, excepting only the members of the Five Civilized Tribes and the Quapaw Indians, which tribes were expressly excepted from the operations of said act. The Choctaws and Chickasaws are in the "Five Civilized Tribes."

Mr. Chairman, I now desire, as part of my remarks, to submit the following statement and brief by attorneys for many persons seeking enrollment under my bill:

TREATY OF 1820 WITH CHOCTAWS.

On October 18, 1820, the United States Government, through its representatives regularly appointed, negotiated a treaty with the Choctaw Indians, then residing on their reservation, which formed a part of the territory included in the now States of Alabama and Mississippi, which treaty was duly ratified by the Senate of the United States and proclaimed as a law January 8, 1821 (7 Stat., 210). By Article one of said treaty the Choctaws ceded to the United States "a small part" only of their lands then occupied by them and situated East of the Mississippi River. (See preamble to treaty, Indian Laws and Treaties, vol. 2, p. 133.) By Article two of said treaty the Government ceded to the Choctaw Nation the identical lands the title to which is now in controversy, and certain additional lands, heretofore sold by the Choctaws and Chickasaws, the proceeds derived from which are also the subject of this controversy.

The object of the Government in entering into the treaty of 1820 and the cession of the Western lands to the Choctaw Nation was for the purpose of effectuating the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi River, which object failed of accomplishment. The Government had not then determined upon a definite policy with reference to the removal of the Indians. The enactment of legislation for the removal of the Indians East of the Mississippi River was being persistently and strongly urged upon Congress by the people of the then States of the Union. The Presidents of the United States, in their annual and special messages to Congress, were repeatedly urging upon Congress the necessity of declaring, through appropriate legislation, a definite Indian policy which would accomplish the removal of all the Indians then located in the Eastern States to the territory west of the Mississippi River. President Jackson, in his annual message to Congress, under date of December 8, 1829 (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. 2, pp. 256–259, inclusive), reviews the condition of the various Indian tribes, points out the necessity for the inauguration of a new policy, and recommends to Congress the enactment of legislation setting apart "an ample district west of the Mississippi * * * to be guaranteed to the Indian tribes as long as they shall occupy it. * * * There they may be secured in the enjoyment of governments of their own choice, subject to no other control from the United States than such as may be necessary to preserve peace on the frontier and between the several tribes."

ACT OF MAY 28, 1830.

In response to this message of President Jackson and in compliance with the demands of the people of the several States, Congress, at that session, passed the act approved May 28, 1830 (4 Stat. L., p. 411), providing for an exchange of lands with Indians, section 3 of which is as follows:

"SECTION 3. And be it further enacted, That in the making of any such exchange or exchanges, it shall and may be lawful for the President to solemnly assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made that the United States will forever secure and guarantee to them and their heirs or successors the country so exchanged with them; and, if they prefer it, that the United States will cause a patent or grant to be made and executed to them for the same: Provided, always, That such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon the same."

Under this act of Congress no title in fee simple to the Indians could be conveyed by the President of the United States. Every reservation west of the Mississippi River given an Indian tribe in exchange for the lands which the Indians held east of the Mississippi River was, under the provisions of this act of Congress, an exchange merely of the possessory right and did not and could not operate to pass a fee simple title. In every case where the Indian tribe or nation holds a fee simple title (as in the case of the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, and other Indian tribes), the fee-simple conveyance was made pursuant to the express terms and provisions of special treaties with each of the Indian tribes.

The attempt on the part of the authorities of Alabama and Mississippi to enforce the State laws against the Choctaws and the encroachment of the white settlers upon their lands culminated in the Choctaws, on the 17th day of March, 1830 (and prior to the enactment of the act approved May 28, 1830), submitted to President Jackson a draft of a proposed treaty for the cession of all their lands east of the Mississippi River to the United States; the conveyance by the Government to them of a FULL AND PERFECT TITLE IN FEE SIMPLE to the western lands, and their removal thereto.

President Jackson redrafted the proposed treaty—making many changes and alterations in practically all of the articles except article 1, which provided for the conveyance of the western lands to the Choctaws—in which draft it was expressly stated that the title to be conveyed must be a FULL AND PERFECT TITLE IN FEE SIMPLE, and on the 6th day of May, 1830, he transmitted the two drafts of the proposed treaty, accompanied by a protest signed by certain persons claiming to be full bloods, and a special message explanatory thereof, to the Senate of the United States, and requested the views of the Senate with reference to the terms upon which it might be advisable to conclude a treaty with the Choctaws. (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. 2, p. 479.)

Articles 1 and 30 of the proposed treaty, as drafted by the Choctaws and transmitted to President Jackson, provided in part as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. The United States shall secure to the said Choctaw Nation of red people the perpetual peaceful possession of all that tract of country known and described in a treaty as the Choctaw land, west of the Mississippi River, embraced in the following lines and limits, viz: * * * and immediately on the ratification of this treaty a patent shall be issued by the President of the United States GRANTING AND TRANSFERRING to the said Choctaw Nation of Red People a FULL AND PERFECT TITLE IN FEE SIMPLE to all the land within the before-described limits, and FOREVER WARRANTING AND DEFENDING THE PEACEABLE POSSESSION OF THE SAME TO THE CHOCTAW NATION, THEIR DESCENDANTS, and CITIZENS.

* * * * * * * *

"ARTICLE 30. This treaty is the only proposition that the Choctaw Nation will ever make to the United States, and proposes the only terms on which the said nation will emigrate to the West; * * *."

Article 1 of the treaty proposed by the Choctaws, as amended by President Jackson and submitted to the Senate, was as follows:

"The United States shall secure to the said Choctaw Nation of red people the perpetual peaceful possession of all that tract of country known and described in a treaty as the Choctaw lands, west of the Mississippi River, embraced in the following lines and limits, viz:

* * * * * * * *

"And so soon after the ratification of this treaty as Congress shall authorize it a patent shall be issued by the President of the United States GRANTING AND TRANSFERRING to the said Choctaw Nation of Red People a FULL AND PERFECT TITLE IN FEE SIMPLE to all the land within the before-described limits, and FOREVER WARRANTING AND DEFENDING THE PEACEABLE POSSESSION OF THE SAME TO THE CHOCTAW NATION AND THEIR DESCENDANTS."

The Senate Committee on Indian Affairs stated in its report to the Senate that, after fully considering all the documents transmitted by the President relative to the proposed treaty with the Choctaws, it did not deem it admissible to recommend the ratification of the treaty, for, among other reasons, that one of the documents transmitted was a protest from one of the districts of the Choctaw Nation; that as the treaty had not been negotiated by Government officers after a poll of the nation, the committee had no way of knowing what percentage of the Choctaw people were in favor of making any treaty with the United States, and therefore recommended that the Senate advise the President by resolution not to "make or ratify" the proposed treaty. On May 27, 1830, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate do advise the President of the United States not to make or ratify the treaty which the Choctaw Indians have proposed in the project submitted to him dated the 17th day of March, 1830, and which accompanied his message to the Senate on the 6th instant." (Executive Journal, vol. 4, p. 111.)

PRESIDENT JACKSON'S REPRESENTATIONS TO THE CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS.

President Jackson thereafter advised the Choctaws of the action of the Senate and informed them that he would meet the Choctaws and Chickasaws at Franklin, Tenn., and personally inform them of the policy and intentions of the Government, in order that a treaty might be negotiated which would be acceptable to the Senate.

President Jackson, accompanied by Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee, arrived at Franklin, Tenn., on Monday, August 23, 1830. The Choctaws were not present. The Chickasaws, who were assembled, were addressed by President Jackson at some length, in which address the President urged the Chickasaws to consent to remove west of the Mississippi, and as an inducement to them pointed out that their new homes west of the Mississippi would be the property of THEM AND THEIR CHILDREN. The President said:

"Determine what may appear to you best to be done for the benefit of yourselves and your children. The only plan by which this can be done, and tranquillity for your people obtained, is that you pass across the Mississippi to a country in all respects equal, if not superior, to the one you have. Your Great Father will GIVE IT TO YOU FOREVER, that it may belong to YOU AND YOUR CHILDREN, while you shall exist as a nation, free from all interruption." (Senate Doc. 512, vol. 2, p. 240, 23d Cong., 1st sess.)

On the 26th of August the President and his associates met the Chickasaw delegates. J. McLish, Secretary of the Chickasaw Nation, delivered the reply of the Chickasaws to the address of the President, in part, as follows:

"FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: Our Father, the President, has communicated to us through you (Major Eaton and General Coffee) his earnest desire to make us a prosperous and happy people. To accomplish this great object, that is to us so desirable, he proposed to give us a country west of the Mississippi in exchange for the country we now possess, IN FEE SIMPLE, or, to use his own words, 'AS LONG AS THE GRASS GROWS AND WATER RUNS.'" (Senate Doc. 512, vol. 2, p. 244, 23d Cong., 1st sess.)

President Jackson then instructed his Commissioners, Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee, to continue the negotiations with the Chickasaws, and then proceed to Mississippi and conduct negotiations with the Choctaws, with the object in view of entering into treaties with both tribes, and especially instructed his Commissioners "TO ACT LIBERALLY TOWARD THEM."

On September 15, 1830, Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee arrived at the Indian agency at Dancing Rabbit Creek, Mississippi, in pursuance of the instructions of President Jackson. Negotiations looking to the formulation of a treaty with the Choctaws were immediately thereafter commenced. (Journal of Proceedings, Senate Doc. 512, vol. 2, p. 251, 23d Cong., 1st sess.)

On September 18, 1830, Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee advised the Choctaws at the treaty grounds as follows:

"BROTHERS: We have come a considerable distance to meet you, under the direction of your Great Father. He had invited you to meet and shake hands with him in Tennessee, that, AS A FRIEND AND A FATHER, HE MIGHT SPEAK WITH YOU. He was informed at Washington City that you desired it. Arriving at home, he sent Major Donley to you with news of his wishes, of his desire to converse with you on matters of deep and lasting interest to your nation. You refused to come, and returned for answer that you could not. Well might your Great Father then have said: 'I will no more try to preserve you, but leave you to live as you can under the laws of the States.' When thus he was about to determine to leave you and no more persuade you to a course of happiness, a messenger reached him, bearing from two of the three districts of your nation a memorial entreating that Commissioners might be sent. ANXIOUS STILL FOR THOSE WHO HAD FOUGHT BY HIS SIDE IN BEHALF OF HIS COUNTRY, he determined to yield that request and to send those who would SPEAK HIS WISHES FREELY AND CANDIDLY, and thereby prove the desire he entertained to preserve you, notwithstanding his previous friendly offers had been rejected.

"BROTHERS: In 1820, by a treaty made with you at Doak's Stand by your present Great Father, an extensive and fine country was GIVEN TO YOU FOR THE USE OF YOUR PEOPLE. It was a gift to you, for the country you ceded to the United States was paid for fully. It was the understanding at the time that the Choctaws would remove; and on that account was it that a large, salable, and fertile country was provided for your nation and your people. Ten years have passed by and you are still here. The country intended for you yet remains wild and unsettled.

"BROTHERS: A fertile country beyond the Mississippi, and another possessed here, is more than you should expect. If you will not remove other Indian tribes may desire to do so; and, where they shall elect to settle, a home must be furnished; others wanting it, the country should not remain a desert. YOU MUST DECIDE WHICH YOU WILL TAKE AND WHICH YOU WILL LIVE UPON; BOTH COUNTRIES YOU CAN NOT POSSESS—IT IS UNREASONABLE TO EXPECT IT. If you prefer to live under our laws and customs, remain and do so, AND SURRENDER THE LANDS ASSIGNED TO YOU WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI, or otherwise remove to them. THERE YOUR GREAT FATHER CAN PROTECT YOU; and there undisturbed and uninterrupted by the whites, you can enjoy yourselves and be happy, now and for years to come. Rest assured you can not be so here. But, if you think differently, then continue where you are. After the present time we shall no more offer to treat with you. You have commissioners in your country for the last time. Hereafter you will be left to yourselves, and the laws of the States within which you reside; and, when weary of them, your nation must remove as it can, and at its own expense. Whatever you may determine upon, whether to remove or to remain, our earnest and sincere wishes are that you may be happy and contented. For you we have the best feelings; our complexions are different, but our hearts and our nature are the same. The Great Spirit above is our common Father; He has made us all and we are all His."

Wednesday, 22.—"The Commissioners met the council at 10 o'clock, the chiefs and their captains present, except Netuchache, who was reported to be sick from the bite of a spider. Order and silence being had, the Commissioners proposed, for their consideration and approval, the outlines of the treaty they were willing to enter into. It is as follows."

* * * * * * * *

"The chief, Leadstone, inquired if the present treaty was to be considered as retaining former treaties and their provisions, or as repealing all former treaties, and the present one only to be relied on? The answere was, that it was desirable fully to embrace everything; that the PRESENT MIGHT be considerd the ONLY TREATY that was to be looked to; that, excepting former annuities ALL PREVIOUS TREATIES WERE TO BE CONSIDERED AS REVOKED AND SET ASIDE. The council then separated."

Thursday, 23.—"This morning the Commissioners were informed that the Indian committee appointed to consider the terms proposed were about to reject them and refuse to treat; that it was represented to them there was but one spring—and only one—in the country west of the Mississippi; and that the laws of a State had already been extended over the Cherokees who had removed there.

"The Commissioners returned for answer that the representations were wholly incorrect; that there was no State near to where the Cherokees lived, or within many miles of them or the country owned by the Choctaws; that the information was by evil-minded persons, intended to deceive and to prejudice their minds, and requested that they would meet to receive their explanations. The answer was, that at 12 o'clock they would again meet in council, and desired the presence of the Commissioners."

Twelve o'clock—"The Commissioners attended at the council house and received, through the chairman of the committee, Peter Pitchlyn, their determination and report. They stated their great surprise at being informed their Father had understood they were in distress and dissatisfied, and were surprised at being informed they could not retain the lands which by the Treaty of 1820 had been secured to them; that they had concluded not to treat for a sale of their lands. The report being received, the Secretary of War rose and made an address to them verbally before the council; told them of their situation and condition, and the impossibility, on the part of their Great Father, to prevent the operation of the laws over them; that they had been badly advised, and were putting reliance in persons who, while they professed to be their friends, would be sure to forget them in the hour of difficulty and trial. Their object, he well knew, was to claim the best bargain they could, and the Commissioners were prepared to give them one, in all respects liberal, to the extent that they could hope the Senate of the United States would ratify. The Government intended this as the last treaty ever to be held with them, and it certainly was the last time that Commissioners would ever appear in their nation to talk with them on the subject. They had come as friends, and at their own request, to protect them from injury, not to cavil with them about prices. As for their lands, the Government cared nothing, for they had enough. Their object was merely the possession of the country, with out regard to anything of value or profit to be obtained from the sale of them. He called their attention to a printed letter to the War Department from two of three of their districts, and which two of their principal chiefs had signed, in which they had said most feelingly that they were distressed, and could not possibly live under the laws of the State, and begged that Commissioners might be sent to their nation to conclude a treaty. For them now to state differently showed their insincerity and deception. That thereafter their complaints would not be regarded, because they could not be confided in. The Secretary of War requested them to understand that their removal was to be a matter for their own reflection and judgment; unless they really believed, in consenting to emigrate, their happiness could be promoted, he begged them not to think of removing; that they must go freely and of their own accord or not at all. They had to-day declared that they were unwilling to remove. He supposed that they had arrived at the conclusion that they could remain where they were and live under the laws of Mississippi, and of course the Commissioners had nothing more to say or to advise. They would now take their leave and go home. It was a matter of regret, he said, that their judgment had erred so much in the decision they had made. Throughout the language of all of them had been that they could not live under the white man's laws. If such was not their deliberate opinion, why had they avowed it, and why did they solicit the President to send Commissioners to treat with them when they could not but know it was attended with great expense? He said he well knew that many of them could live anywhere where he could; their education and intelligence authorized him to say and believe so; but the common, uninstructed Indian could not. For them to live under laws which they could neither read nor be made to understand was expecting too much. And what are they to do under the decision just pronounced? Will they resist the laws? The sheriff must enforce them. Will they oppose him with their guns and tomahawks? While the Choctaws could raise one warrior to resist there would be found one hundred or one thousand to one to oppose that resistance and to enforce the law. These are things which seriously they should have considered before their decision was pronounced. The Commissioners, he said, had nothing further to remark, but to take leave of them and go home, and accordingly they retired from the council.

"Shortly afterwards they were waited upon by several persons of the committee, with a request that they would not leave the treaty ground; that they had considered of the remarks which had been made to them, and had no doubt, if the Commissioners would remain a few days longer, that a treaty could be made. To this the Commissioners assented."

Saturday, 25th, 9 o'clock.—"The committee on the part of the Indians handed in a plan presenting the grounds upon which they were willing to treat. It contained various objectionable features, and among others a proposition to create a perpetual stock of $5,000,000 at an interest of 5 per cent, but redeemable at the pleasure of the Choctaw Nation after twenty years. The Commissioners returned for answer that the terms had been fully considered and that some of them were inadmissible, but that at 11 o'clock they would meet the chiefs and warriors in council and state to them there what they were willing and disposed to do."

Eleven o'clock.—"The council met; present, the Commissioners, three chiefs, captains, and warriors of the nation, when the following terms were proposed and interpreted.

* * * * * * *

"The foregoing having been read and explained, the three chiefs and others of the principal men addressed the council and urged the acceptance of the terms which were offered. The explanations being made, the council broke up."

Sunday, 26th.—"Some conference at the Commissioners' quarters took place this morning between the chiefs and some of the captains and headmen in which SEVERAL ALTERATIONS AND ADDITIONS WERE MADE TO THE TERMS PROPOSED."

Monday, 27th.—"A meeting at the council house took place to-day. The treaty as drawn up was submitted, interpreted, and explained, and at 1 o'clock it was signed." * * *

TREATY UNDER WHICH APPLICANTS CLAIM.

Articles 1 and 2 of the treaty as drafted by the Commissioners representing the Government of the United States and the changes and interlineations made before the treaty was signed, as shown by the original document on file in the office of the Secretary of State, are as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. Perpetual peace and friendship is pledged and agreed upon by and between the United States and the Mingoes, chiefs and warriors of the Choctaw Nation of Red People; and that this may be considered the * * * treaty existing between the parties all other treaties heretofore existing and inconsistent with the provisions of this are hereby declared null and void.

"ARTICLE 2. The United States, under a grant specially to be made by the President of the United States, shall cause to be conveyed to the Choctaw Nation a tract of country west of the Mississippi River in fee simple to them and their descendants, to inure to them while they shall exist as a nation and live on it, beginning near Fort Smith where the Arkansas boundary crosses the Arkansas River, running thence * * * to the source of the Canadian fork; if in the limits of the United States, or to those limits; thence due south to Red River, and down Red River to the west boundary of the Territory of Arkansas; thence north along the line to the beginning.

"The boundary of the same to be agreeably to the treaty made and concluded at Washington City in the year 1825. The grant to be executed as soon as the present treaty shall be ratified." [*Indicates matter scratched out.]

SPECIAL OBJECT IN USE OF WORD "DESCENDANTS."

It will be observed that President Jackson, Secretary of War John H. Eaton, and Gen. John Coffee, throughout their conferences and negotiations with the Indians, repeatedly solemnly assured the Indians that if they would treat with the United States and move to the western reserve, the Great Father, desirous of dealing liberally with his Indian children, "WILL GIVE IT TO YOU FOREVER, THAT IT MAY BELONG TO YOU AND YOUR CHILDREN," or "WE WILL GIVE IT TO YOU AND YOUR CHILDREN FOREVER IN FEE SIMPLE." It will further be observed that after the treaty had been drafted by the Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee, at the insistence of the Indians there was the following interlineation made in article 2: "The United States, under a grant specially to be made by the President of the United States, shall cause to be conveyed to the Choctaw Nation a tract of country west of the Mississippi River IN FEE SIMPLE TO THEM AND THEIR DESCENDANTS, TO INURE TO THEM WHILE THEY SHALL EXIST AS A NATION AND LIVE ON IT."

Why did the Indians insist upon the use of the word "descendants" when President Jackson, Secretary of War Eaton, and General Coffee had at all times been talking about the Choctaws and their CHILDREN? Because "DESCENDANTS" was the only word to be found in the vocabulary of the English language that would include "THEIR CHILDREN." The word "HEIRS," as technically used and defined, or any other word known to legal phraseology, WOULD HAVE EXCLUDED ALL THE CHILDREN OF THE THEN LIVING CHOCTAWS FROM PARTICIPATING IN THE PROPERTY. These people in 1830 were living in a state of nature, and continued to live in such a state for many years thereafter, as appears from the written decisions of our courts.

In the case of Wall v. Williamson (11 Ala., 839), tried in the year 1842, it appeared in evidence that, by the Choctaw law, the husband could dissolve the relationship at pleasure, and a marriage of this kind, within the limits of the tribe, was held valid.

The court further says:

"That marriage among the Indian tribes must be regarded as taking place in a state of nature; and if, according to the usages and customs of the particular tribe, the parties are authorized to dissolve it at pleasure, the right of dissolution will be considered a term of the contract."

In the same decision the court says:

"If permanency is to be regarded as an essential element of marriage by the law of nature, it is clear that all such connections which have taken place among the various tribes of North American Indians, either between persons of pure Indian blood or between half-breeds, or between the white and Indian races, must be regarded as mere illicit intercourse, and the offspring be considered as illegitimate; for it appears to be well established by historians and travelers, as well as by the reported testimony in judicial proceedings occurring in the courts of some of our States, that in most of the tribes, perhaps in all, the understanding of the parties is that the husband may dissolve the contract at his pleasure. In a work published by Mr. Schoolcraft concerning the manners and customs of the North American Indians, under the authority of the Government of the United States, the writer says: 'The marital rite is nothing more, among our tribes, than the personal consent of the parties, without requiring any concurrent act of priesthood or magistracy, or witness; the act is assumed by the parties without the necessity of any extraneous sanction except parental consent. Presents are, however, often made if the parties are able. It is also disannulled and the wife dismissed from the wigwam whenever the husband pleases, or the marital state is continued under the evils of discord or a state of polygamy. The latter is, however, the usual method among the hunter and prairie tribes. BUT THE TIES OF CONSANGUINITY ARE STILL STRICTLY ACKNOWLEDGED; CHILDREN BECOME POSSESSED OF THEIR NATURAL RIGHTS AND FAMILY TRADITION TRACES THESE TO THEIR REMOTEST LINKS.' In Robertson's History of America (book 4) the same peculiarity is noticed as characterizing the contract of marriage as it prevailed among the natives of South America."

In a statement of fact the court refers to the testimony of witnesses relative to the Choctaw tribal marital customs. It says:

"Another witness introduced by the plaintiff stated that he had inquired into and informed himself as to the laws and customs of the Choctaws. The tribe had no written laws. They married and unmarried at pleasure, a man frequently having several wives. When a man found a woman he wished to marry he made her a present of a blanket and she became his wife. When he wished to dissolve the marriage he abandoned her. The husband took no part of the wife's property by marriage, and she retained all the rights of a femme sole."

In an earlier case between the same parties and reported in the Eighth Alabama, the court says, in referring to the tribal laws and customs relating to and controlling marriage and divorce among the Choctaws:

"Whatever may have been the capacity of the husband to abandon his wife and thereby to dissolve the marriage, if both had become residents of Alabama after the tribe had departed from its limits, it is very clear that the same effect must be given to a dissolution of the marriage by the Choctaw law as given to the marriage by the same law. By that law it appears that the husband may at pleasure dissolve the relation. His abandonment is evidence that he has done so. We conceive the same effect must be given to this act as would be given a lawful decree in a civilized community dissolving the marriage. HOWEVER STRANGE IT MAY APPEAR AT THIS DAY THAT A MARRIAGE MAY THUS EASILY BE DISSOLVED, THE CHOCTAWS ARE SCARCELY WORSE THAN THE ROMANS, WHO PERMITTED THE HUSBAND TO DISMISS HIS WIFE FOR THE MOST FRIVOLOUS CAUSES." (Story, Confl. of Laws, 169.)

The supreme court of the State of Missouri in the case of Johnson v. Johnson's Administrator (9 Mo. Reports, p. 88) reaffirmed the holding of the Alabama supreme court in the two cases above referred to, and from that day to this not a single decision can be found of any court holding to the contrary.

TREATY DULY RATIFIED.

On the 24th day of February, 1831, the treaty was duly ratified by the Senate of the United States, approved by President Jackson, and proclaimed as a law.

UNDERSTANDING OF CONTRACTING PARTIES WAS THAT CONVEYANCE SHOULD BE IN FEE SIMPLE.

The Government of the United States, by the second article of the treaty of 1830, stipulated and agreed with the Choctaws that the grant should be made in fee simple, and such was unquestionably the understanding of the Indians and the representatives of the Government, both before and after the negotiation and ratification of the treaty. In the case of The United States v. The Choctaw Nation (179 U. S., pp. 531–535; 45 L. ed., pp. 306, 307), Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, ably and exhaustively reviews the various decisions of that court relating to the construction of treaties with Indians, and then quotes from Mr. Justice Story in the Amiable Isabella (6 Wheat., 1, 71, 72; 5 L. ed., 191, 208), which he says is applicable to the construction of treaties with Indians, as follows:

"We are to FIND OUT THE INTENTION of the parties by just rules of interpretation applied to the subject-matter; and having found THAT our duty is to follow IT as far as IT goes and to stop where THAT stops, whatever may be the imperfections or difficulties which IT leaves behind. * * * In the next place, this court is bound to GIVE EFFECT TO THE STIPULATIONS OF THE TREATY IN THE MANNER AND TO THE EXTENT which the parties have DECLARED, and not otherwise."

In this case (United States v. Choctaw Nation, 179 U. S., pp. 511–517) the court recites at length the correspondence between the Indians and the Government officers before the signing of the treaty, and then says:

"We have made this extended reference to the correspondence between the Indians and the officers of the United States for the purpose, not only of showing that the Choctaws had no claim, legal or equitable, to territory west of the one hundredth degree of west longitude, but indicating the situation and relation of the parties when the treaty of 1855, to be presently referred to, was concluded."

In the case of the New York Indians v. United States (170 U. S., p. 34; 42 L. ed., p. 939) the court refers to the correspondence between the Indians and the Government officers after the signing of the treaty, and then says:

"While none of these documents are of great importance in themselves, they serve to indicate very clearly that in the mind of the Executive and departmental officers the rights of the Indians, under the treaty of Buffalo Creek, were continuously recognized as just claims against the Government."

We have hereinbefore called attention to the proposed treaty prepared by the Choctaws and transmitted to President Jackson, and by him redrafted and sent to the Senate, which formed the basis of the treaty of 1830, under which this grant was made. The Choctaw draft, article 1, provided:

"And immediately on the ratification of this treaty, a patent shall be issued by the President of the United States, GUARANTEEING AND THANSFERRING to the Choctaw Nation of Red People A FULL AND PERFECT TITLE IN FEE SIMPLE to all the lands within the above-described limits, and FOREVER WARRANTING AND DEFENDING the peaceable possession of the same to the Choctaw Nation, their descendants, and citizens."

And by article 30 it was declared:

"This is the only proposition that the Choctaw Nation will ever make to the United States, and proposes the only terms on which the said Nation will emigrate to the West."

The above terms proposed by the Choctaws leave no room to doubt that they expected, and would accept nothing short of a patent issued by the President of the United States guaranteeing and transferring to the Choctaws a full and perfect title in fee simple, and forever warranting and defending the same.

It is equally evident from President Jackson's redraft of the treaty that he intended to convey a perfect title in fee simple. His draft of the proposed treaty as transmitted to the Senate provided:

"ARTICLE 1. * * * And so soon after the ratification of this treaty as Congress shall authorize it a patent shall be issued by the President of the United States GRANTING AND TRANSFERRING to the said Choctaw Nation of Red People A FULL AND PERFECT TITLE IN FEE SIMPLE to all the lands within the before-described limits and FOREVER WARRANTING AND DEFENDING THE PEACEABLE POSSESSION OF THE SAME to the Choctaw Nation and their descendants."

The correspondence between the Government officers and the Choctaws and Chickasaws immediately preceding the signing of the treaty in 1830 and the interlineations made therein before signing (hereinbefore set out) also clearly show an intention on the part of the Government to convey the lands in fee simple and an understanding on the part of the Choctaws that they were to receive nothing short of a fee-simple title.

Let us now consider the correspondence following the ratification of the treaty of 1830 for the purpose of ascertaining the understanding of the Government officers as to the nature of the title conveyed to the Indians. On December 30, 1831, Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee, who negotiated the Treaty of 1830 with the Choctaws, addressed the Chickasaws at Franklin, Tenn., in part as follows (Senate Doc. No. 512, vol. 4, pp. 15, 16, 23d Cong., 1st sess.):

"BROTHERS: The country which your Great Father proffered you is no longer his. It has been ceded to other tribes, and now the only alternative before you is to obtain by PURCHASE a portion of the CHOCTAW LANDS. They are your neighbors, friends, and brothers, and have it to spare. A hope is entertained that, mindful of their ancient friendships and being possessed of a larger country than they can ever want, they will not fail to accommodate you, if your wishes be made known to them in an earnest, frank, and proper manner. Now is the time to act. Decline, and put it off to some future time, and it may be too late. The wants and condition of the Chickasaws being frankly and fully made known, their Choctaw brothers will not turn away and leave them to suffer. Their Great Father will not think so unkindly of them as to suppose they will refuse, when he is willing to make them a reasonable and fair compensation for their liberality."

At the council house, Chickasaw Nation, January 15, 1832, the Chickasaws, in reply to Generals Coffee and Eaton, said:

"We are aware that the COUNTRY OFFERED TO US AT THAT TIME IS NO LONGER THE PROPERTY OF THE UNITED STATES. We are sorry for it. Having from our first acquaintance confided in the talks delivered by the United States authorities, we are disposed to acknowledge that the only hope that now remains for us to avoid a state of things the realities of which we would deeply deplore is to endeavor to ACQUIRE A PORTION OF THE CHOCTAW LANDS."

On December 6 Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee addressed the Chickasaws at Oaka Knoxabee Creek, in part, as follows (Senate Doc. No. 512, vol. 4, p. 17, 23d Cong., 1st sess.):

"One hope remains—the CHOCTAWS near whom you have so long resided, POSSESS A COUNTRY to the west infinitely greater in extent than is required for their use and wants. * * *

"Your Great Father, anxious to advance the interest and happiness of his red children of the Chickasaws will cheerfully assist them in RENDERING A FAIR EQUIVALENT TO THEIR CHOCTAW BROTHERS FOR WHATEVER PRIVILEGE OR SETTLEMENT THEY MAY BE DISPOSED TO GRANT. * * *"

By the laws of the United States no contract for the purchase of land can be entered into by Indians except in the presence of Commissioners who represent the Government.

In an address to the Choctaws and Chickasaws Secretary of War John H. Eaton and Gen. John Coffee, at Oaka Knoxabee Creek, December 7, 1831, said (Senate Doc. No. 512, vol. 4, pp. 18, 19, 20, 21):

"The COUNTRY WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI, WHICH IS SECURED BY THE TREATY OF DANCING RABBIT, is sufficient for an infinitely greater population than the Choctaws have. The population of each nation being united, more land will be possessed than is sufficient for the uses and purposes of both. * * *"

"We speak to you by instructions from your Great Father. * * *

"BROTHERS: We come to visit you as friends. We earnestly desire your prosperity and seek no other object. WE HAVE NOT HERETOFORE DECEIVED YOU NOR WILL WE NOW. A new era is opening upon your people. Our desire is, by disclosing obvious truths, to awaken you to a necessity of your essential interests. Concede to your Chickasaw brothers a portion of your country. By doing so both will be benefited. Assent, and the condition of each will be improved; but refuse and your older brothers will be constrained to languish under that state of things—submission to the white man's laws—which you have already confessed your people could not bear, and which, consequently, has occasioned their removal from the land of their fathers.

"But the territory OWNED by the Choctaws is fully equal to that which they and the Chickasaws together occupy on this side of the Mississippi and superior in climate and fertility of soil. * * *

"Or, if this be not acceptable to both nations, and a defined plan of government can not be agreed upon, then for consent to be given, and for an agreement to be made, that the Chickasaws shall occupy, and independently hold, such portion of the CHOCTAW COUNTRY AS MAY BE APPROVED BY THEIR BROTHERS, THE CHOCTAWS. For this liberality your Great Father will consent to PAY what may be considered reasonable and proper. Whatever assistance we can render, in forming with you a plan of government and union for the advancement and prosperity of both nations, will (if requested) be cheerfully given. In the meantime, until a plan be agreed upon, let your brothers, the Chicasaws, participate in YOUR LANDS. * * *"

Here we find the Secretary of War, charged by law with the administration of Indian affairs, speaking for the President, and being the person who negotiated the treaty of 1830 for the Government, assuring the Choctaws and Chickasaws that he has not theretofore deceived them, and will not, and informing the Chickasaws that the "COUNTRY WHICH YOUR GREAT FATHER PROFFERED YOU IS NO LONGER HIS," and that they must treat with the Choctaws in order to secure a portion of the lands which the "CHOCTAWS OWN."

There is no doubt that the Choctaws, by the third article of the treaty of 1830, made an absolute, unconditional, and immediate surrender of all their title to the lands east of the Mississippi to the Government of the United States, and it is unreasonable to assume that they expected or intended that the conveyance to them of the lands west of the Mississippi should be anything less than a fee simple. The language used in the treaty clearly imports that an immediate and irrevocable grant shall be made to the Choctaws. In the case of New York Indians v. United States (170 U. S., p. 19, 42 L. ed., pp. 933–934) the court says:

"There can be no doubt that the cession by the Indians of their interest in the Wisconsin lands, in the first article of the treaty, was an absolute, unconditional, and immediate grant, and it is improbable that the Indians would have consented, or that the United States would desire, that they should accept from the Government a mere promise to set apart for them in the future the tract in Kansas. If we are to adopt such a construction it would follow that the title of the Indians, not only to the tract in Kansas, but to the lands in Wisconsin, was made dependent upon their removal to their new home. While it might be reasonably contended that their failure to remove should result in a cancellation of the treaty and a restoration to them of their rights in the Wisconsin lands, that construction is precluded by the language of the first article, which contains a present and irrevocable grant of the Wisconsin lands and puts it beyond their power to revoke the bargain." * * *

TREATY PROVIDED FOR SPECIAL GRANT AND SPECIAL INDIAN POLICY FOR CHOCTAWS.

That article two of the treaty of 1830 provided for a special grant to the Choctaws of the lands west of the Mississippi not only appears from the express language used therein, but is so declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States v. Choctaw Nation (179 U. S., p. 508, 45 L. ed., p. 297). Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, said:

"It can not be doubted that the purpose of article 2 of the treaty of 1830 was to provide for a SPECIAL GRANT to the Choctaws of the lands intended to be ceded to them by article 2 of the treaty of 1820 and no others."

GRANT MADE NOT IN EXACT CONFORMITY WITH TREATY.

On the 24th day of February, 1831, the treaty was duly ratified by the Senate of the United States and approved by President Jackson. On the 26th day of May, 1831, President Jackson executed under his hand and seal "three grants on parchment" for the lands which it was provided by article 2 of the treaty should be conveyed to the Choctaws, as appears from the following communication (Senate Doc. 512, vol. 2, p. 304, 23d Cong., 1st sess.):

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS,
June 9, 1831.

SIR: I transmit herewith, by direction of the Secretary of War, three grants on parchment from the President of the United States to the Choctaw Nation, for the lands assigned to said nation west of the Mississippi by the late treaty, one for the principal chief of each district of the nation. You will deliver them, accordingly, when you meet the chiefs to pay the annuity, or at any other convenient opportunity.

I am, etc., SAMUEL S. HAMILTON.

Col. WILLIAM WARD, Choctaw Agent.

The grant made by President Jackson to the Choctaws was as follows:

"Whereas on the 27th day of September last a treaty was concluded at Dancing Rabbit Creek between Commissioners duly appointed on the part of the United States and the Choctaw Nation of Indians; and the same, having been ratified by the Senate, was officially promulgated on the 24th of February, 1831, which treaty, in the second article, stipulates 'that the United States, under a grant specially to be made by the President, shall cause to be conveyed to the Choctaw Nation a tract of country west of the Mississippi River, in fee simple to them and their descendants, to inure to them while they shall exist as a nation and live on it, beginning near Fort Smith, where the Arkansas boundary crosses the Arkansas River, running thence to the source of the Canadian fork, if in the limits of the United States, or to those limits; thence due south to Red River and down Red River to the west boundary of the Territory of Arkansas; thence north along that line to the beginning.'

"Now, in pursuance of said treaty, and of the powers and authority vested in me by an act of Congress approved the 28th day of May, 1830, entitled 'An act to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories and for their removal west of the Mississippi River,' said country as is described in the second article of said treaty, is hereby granted and assigned to said Choctaw Nation of Indians to the extent and after the condition of tenure therein declared, and liable to no transfer or alienation except to the United States.

"In testimony hereof, and that the same may be carried into effect, I have signed this grant with my own hand, and cause it to be certified under the seal of the War Department, this 26th day of May, 1831, and of the State Department.

ANDREW JACKSON.

By the President:
E. LIVINGSTON, Secretary of State.
By the President of the United States:
JOHN H. EATON, Secretary of War.

We are advised by the officers of the State, War, and Interior Departments that this grant is not of record in their respective Departments, and the copy hereinabove set out is taken from Senate Document 512, volume 2, pages 304 and 305, Twenty-third Congress, first session. Neither have we, after repeated inquiries at the Departments of the Government and diligent search of all Government documents and papers bearing on this subject, been able to secure any reference to this grant other than in the one instance in which it appears in the Senate document.

This grant was not in conformity with the established rules and forms of conveyancing, nor strictly in conformity with the terms and provisions of the treaty, and after diligent search we have been unable to find any correspondence or explanation of any kind. We assume that the Government officers considered it defective, for in 1842 President Tyler caused to be issued under his hand and seal a patent reading as follows:

"PATENT.

"The United States of America, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

"Whereas, by the second article of the treaty began and held at Dancing Rabbit Creek, on the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty (as ratified by the Senate of the United States, on the 24th of February, 1831), by the Commissioners on the part of the United States and the Mingoes, chiefs, captains, and warriors of the Choctaw Nation, on the part of said nation, it is provided that 'the United States under a grant SPECIALLY to be made by the President of the United States, shall cause to be conveyed to the Choctaw Nation' a tract of country west of the Mississippi River, IN FEE SIMPLE TO THEM AND THEIR DESCENDANTS, to inure to them while they shall exist as a nation and live on it: Beginning near Fort Smith, where the Arkansas boundary crosses the Arkansas River, running thence to the source of the Canadian fork, if in the limits of the United States, or to those limits; thence due south to Red River, and down Red River to the west boundary of the Territory of Arkansas; thence north along that line to the beginning. The boundary of the same to be agreeably to the treaty made and concluded at Washington City in the year 1825.

"Now, KNOW YE, that the United States of America in consideration of the premises, and in execution of the agreement and stipulation in the aforesaid treaty, have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant, unto the said Choctaw Nation, the aforesaid 'tract of country west of the Mississippi,' to have and to hold the same, with all the rights, privileges, immunities, and appurtenances of whatsoever nature thereunto belonging, AS INTENDED, 'TO BE CONVEYED' by the aforesaid article, IN FEE SIMPLE TO THEM AND THEIR DESCENDANTS TO INURE TO THEM while they shall exist as a nation and live on it, liable to no transfer or alienation except to the United States or with their consent." (Recorded, vol. 1, p. 43, General Land Office.)

The Supreme Court of the United States recognizes this latter patent as the instrument by which the grant was made in the case of United States v. Choctaw Nation (179 U. S., p. 522, 45 L. ed., p. 302) wherein the court says:

"The treaty closed this dispute forever; if it had not been closed by previous treaties and by the SPECIAL GRANT OF 1842 made pursuant to ARTICLE 2 of the TREATY OF 1830, and which as we have said estopped the Indians from claiming any lands not within the limits of the United States."

FEE-SIMPLE TITLE CONVEYED.

The inhibition which the Government officers attempted to place upon the transfer or alienation of the lands by adding at the end of the habendum clause of the patent the words "liable to no transfer or alienation except to the United States, or with their consent," was not binding upon the Choctaws. No administrative officer possessed the constitutional power to include in the patent any restrictions upon the grantee not authorized by the treaty. This proposition is elementary and needs no elaboration by argument or citation of authority for its support.

Nor did the words appearing in both the treaty and the patent, "TO INURE TO THEM WHILE THEY SHALL EXIST AS A NATION AND LIVE ON IT," reduce the estate conveyed to less than a fee, as has been contended by those who have opposed the rights of these people. The grant, as we will presently conclusively show, was to the Choctaw Nation, in TRUST, for the EXCLUSIVE USE AND BENEFIT OF THOSE PERSONS COMPRISING THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY ON THE DAY THE TREATY WAS RATIFIED and was to INURE to THEM and THEIR DESCENDANTS. Let us analyze the words of the treaty and the grant and ascertain therefrom their true meaning and intent. The grant was: "To the Choctaw Nation * * * in fee simple to them and their descendants," which vested in the Choctaw Nation, as trustee, the "full and perfect" legal "title in fee simple" and in "them and their descendants" the "full and perfect" equitable "title," and for the purpose of defining the LIFE of the TRUST these words of LIMITATION were added:

"To inure to them while they shall exist as a nation and live on it."

When the Choctaw Nation—the TRUSTEE—ceased to exist, and the PERSONS for whose BENEFIT the TRUST was CREATED ceased to live upon the land as a nation, the fee could no longer INURE but would pass to, and vest in, the then living beneficiaries under the grant, thus completely merging the legal title formerly held by the TRUSTEE with the equitable title held by them, and the members of the former cestui que trust would then be seized in fee of their property.

But this condition has never occurred. The TRUSTEE—the Choctaw Nation—has continued in being and the grant has continued to INURE.

As it has been contended with such fervor that the grant was not a FEE SIMPLE, we shall trespass upon your patience with a more extended argument on this question and the citation of authorities which seem to us conclusive.

In the case of the New York Indians v. United States (170 U. S., p. 20, 42 L. ed., p. 934) the court in determining the nature of the title acquired by the Indians under a treaty which provided for a grant "IN FEE SIMPLE" and in the habendum clause of the treaty, Provided always, THAT SUCH LANDS SHALL REVERT TO THE UNITED STATES IF THE INDIANS BECOME EXTINCT OR ABANDON THE SAME," said:

"In this case if the habendum clause were alone considered, there could be no doubt whatever that the Indians would take a present title to a FEE SIMPLE. There is certainly no conflict between the granting and habendum clauses. Admitting that the former, if standing alone, would engender a doubt as to when the grant should take effect, the habendum clause removes that doubt and imports a present surrender of a defined tract."

Throughout this decision the court refers to the title of the Indians under this grant as a FEE SIMPLE, and cites previous decisions of that court in which the words "hereby cede and relinquish," or "agree to set apart," or "shall be allotted for, and given to," or "shall have their right," and other similar expressions in treaties and grants have been held by that court as conveying a fee-simple title.

It has been contended by attorneys for the nations and the Government of the United States that the treaty of 1830, under which petitioners claim title, must be construed in the light of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1830, in strict conformity with the general governmental Indian policy as therein declared, and not otherwise. This contention we submit is little short of an absurdity.

While the treaty in 1830 with the Choctaws, under which petitioners claim title, and the act of Congress approved May 28, 1830, sought to accomplish a common object, viz, the removal of the Indians, very different instrumentalities were employed, and a court is not to be governed in the construction of the treaty of 1830 by the provisions of the act of Congress, particularly where the provisions of the treaty differ widely, as they do, from the provisions of the act of Congress.

Mr. Justice Clifford in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Holden v. Joy (84 U. S., 21 L. ed., pp. 532–533), in deciding a controversy arising from a grant of land to the Cherokees, the patent to which was issued under the act approved May 28, 1830, but which patent was not in conformity with the provisions of the treaty providing for the grant of land, says:

"Much reason exists to suppose that Congress, in framing those provisions, had in view the stipulations of the treaty concluded two years earlier, and it is equally probable that the President and Senate in negotiating and concluding the two treaties of later date were largely governed by the several provisions in that act of Congress, BUT THEY WERE NOT CONTROLLED BY THESE ENACTMENTS, as is evident from the fact that the later of the two contains many stipulations differing widely from the provisions of that act, as, for example, the United States, in the supplemental article enlarging the quantity of land set apart for the accommodation of the nation, expressly covenant and agree TO CONVEY THE ADDITIONAL TRACT TO THE SAID INDIANS AND THEIR DESCENDANTS BY PATENT, IN FEE-SIMPLE TITLE, and the article does not contain any such provision as that contained in the third section of the act of Congress that the land shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon the territory. (4 Stat. L., 412; 7 Stat. L., 480.)

"ATTEMPT IS MADE IN ARGUMENT TO SHOW THAT THE LAST-NAMED TREATY WAS NEGOTIATED BY FORCE OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS TO PROVIDE FOR AN EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITH THE INDIANS, BUT IT IS CLEAR THAT THE PROPOSITION CAN NOT BE SUSTAINED, AS THE TREATY DIFFERS WIDELY IN MANY RESPECTS FROM THE PROVISIONS OF THAT ACT OF CONGRESS. Doubtless the intent and purpose were the same—to quiet the disturbances and to induce the Indians remaining in the States and Territories to emigrate and settle in the district of country set apart for them without the limits of the several States and organized Territories—but the treaty, though concluded to promote the same object as the act of Congress, adopts very different instrumentalities."

FEE STIPULATED FOR IN TREATY OF 1830 CAN NOT BE LIMITED OR RESTRICTED BY PROVISIONS OF ACT OF MAY 28, 1830.

By the treaty of February 14, 1833, the United States agreed to convey to the Cherokee Nation, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1830, 7,000,000 acres of land. In 1835 (7 Stats., 478) the Government entered into another treaty with the Cherokees, whereby it renewed its pledge to convey the said 7,000,000 acres of land to the Cherokee Nation, and also agreed to convey to the said Indians and their descendants by patent in fee simple 800,000 acres of land which was known as the "neutral lands" in Kansas.

Article 3 of the treaty provided (vol. 2 Indian Treaties, p. 441):

"The United States also agree that the lands above ceded by the treaty of February 14, 1833, including the outlet and those ceded by this treaty, shall all be included in one patent executed to the Cherokee Nation of Indians by the President of the United States ACCORDING TO THE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT OF MAY 28, 1830."

The patent issued to the Cherokee Nation recited that the conveyance of both tracts was made pursuant to the act of May 28, 1830. In litigation that arose involving title to the neutral strip, which the treaty provided should be conveyed to the said Indians and their descendants by patent in fee simple, it was contended by counsel that as the Cherokees had not resided on these lands under the provision in the patent inserted in conformity with the act approved May 28, 1830: "Provided always, That such land shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon same" the lands had reverted to the United States.

In passing upon this question, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Clifford, said (84 U. S., 21 L. ed., 536):

"Two objections are made to the title of the appellee as affected by that treaty, in addition to those urged to show that the prior treaty between the same parties was inoperative and invalid. It is contended by the appellant that the Cherokee possessory right to the neutral lands was extinguished by the seventeenth article of the treaty, which undoubtedly is correct, but the conclusion which he attempts to deduce from that fact can not be sustained—that the Cherokee Nation abandoned the lands within the meaning of the last condition inserted in the patent by which they acquired the same from the United States.

"Strong doubts are entertained whether that condition in the patent is valid, as it was not authorized by the treaty under which it was issued. BY THE TREATY THE UNITED STATES COVENANTED AND AGREED TO CONVEY THE LANDS IN FEE-SIMPLE TITLE, AND IT MAY WELL BE HELD THAT IF THAT CONDITION REDUCES THE ESTATE CONVEYED TO LESS THAN A FEE, IT IS VOID."

The conveyance being in fee simple, the Government could not attach a condition subsequent that would impair the right of the grantee to sell, lease, incumber, or otherwise dispose of the estate granted. In the early history of this country this question was settled, and the decisions of the early courts have never been called in question until the last few years, when the idea seems to have become almost universal, except with the judiciary, that Congress and the Executive can do almost anything with reference to private rights.

In the case of De Payster v. Michael (Am. Dec., vol. 57, p. 474), Chief Justice Ruggles, delivering the opinion of the court of appeals of New York, said:

"But it is a well-established principle that where an estate in fee simple is granted, a condition that the grantee shall not alien the land is void. Littleton says: 'Also, if a feoffment be made on this condition that the feoffee shall not alien the land to any, this condition is void: because when a man is enfeoffed of lands or tenants, he hath the power to alien them to any person by law. For if such a condition should be good, then the condition should oust him of all power which the law gives him which should be against reason, and therefore such a condition is void.' (Section 360.)

"Coke, in his commentary on this section, adds: 'And the like law is of a devise in fee upon a condition that the devisee shall not alien, the condition is void; and so it is of a grant, release, confirmation, or any other conveyance whereby a fee simple doth pass.' (Co. Lit., 223a.) The language of Mr. Cruise is: 'A condition annexed to the creation of an estate in fee simple, that the tenant shall not alien, is void and repugnant to the nature of the estate given; for a power of alienation is an incident inseparably annexed to an estate in fee simple.' (Cru. tit., 13, c. 1, sec. 22.) 'The right of alienation passes by the grant of the fee as perfectly as if it were given by the express terms of the grant. Without such right the estate granted would be neither a fee simple nor any other estate known to the law. Lands granted in fee on condition that the grantee shall not enjoy the lands, or shall not take the profits of the lands, or on condition that the heir of the grantee shall not inherit the lands, or on condition that the grantee shall not do waste, or on condition that his wife shall not be endowed—in all these and the like cases the condition is void as repugnant to the estate.' (Shep. Touch., 131.) 'A condition annexed to an estate given is a divided clause from the grant, and therefore can not frustrate the grant precedent, neither in anything expressed nor in anything implied which is of its nature incident and inseparable from the thing granted.' (Stukeley v. Butler, Hob., 170.)

"The reason why such a condition can not be made good by agreement or consent of parties is, that a fee-simple estate and a restraint upon its alienation can not, in their nature, coexist. The ownership of the fee can not exist in one person while the ownership of the right of alienation of its fruits exists in a different person. This is a principle older than the common law of England. Grotius, b. 1, c. 6, sec. 1, says: 'Since the establishment of property, men who are masters of their own goods have by the law of nature the power of disposing of or of transferring all or any part of their effects to other persons; for this is the very nature of property; I mean of full and complete property;' and therefore Aristotle says: 'It is the definition of property to have in one's self the power of alienation.'

"That this principle was at an early day engrafted upon the common law and applied to estates in fee, we have the authority of Littleton, as above cited, and of Coke, 2 Inst., 65. By the common law, it is against the nature and purity of a fee simple 'for the tenants to be restrained from alienation.' But the rule of common law on this point is not founded exclusively on principles of natural law. It rests also on grounds of great public utility and convenience, in facilitating the exchange of property, in simplifying its ownership, and in freeing it from embarrassments, which are injurious, not only to its possessor, but to the public at large."

RESIDENCE ON LAND UNNECESSARY.

That it was not the intention of the contracting parties to make the RIGHT of a person to share in the lands conveyed to the Choctaw Nation in trust DEPENDENT UPON RESIDENCE ON THE LAND conclusively appears from article 14 of the treaty of 1830, under the second article of which treaty the grant was made. Article 14 of the treaty provides:

"EACH CHOCTAW HEAD OF A FAMILY BEING DESIROUS TO REMAIN AND BECOME A CITIZEN OF THE STATES SHALL BE PERMITTED TO DO SO by signifying his intention to the agent within six months from the ratification of this treaty, and he or she shall thereupon be entitled to a reservation of one section of 640 acres of land, to be bounded by sectional lines of survey; in like manner shall be entitled to one-half that quantity for each unmarried child which is living with him over 10 years of age, and a quarter section to such child as may be under 10 years of age, to adjoin the location of the parent. If they reside upon said lands intending to become citizens of the States for five years after the ratification of this treaty, in that case a grant in fee simple shall issue. Said reservation shall include the present improvement of the head of the family or a portion of it. PERSONS WHO CLAIM UNDER THIS ARTICLE SHALL NOT LOSE THE PRIVILEGE OF A CHOCTAW CITIZEN, BUT IF THEY EVER REMOVE ARE NOT TO BE ENTITLED TO ANY PORTION OF THE CHOCTAW ANNUITY."

The Choctaw who remained in Mississippi and Alabama, or who did not remove with the Choctaws to the western lands, FORFEITED ONLY HIS RIGHT TO SHARE IN THE ANNUAL ANNUITIES of twenty thousand dollars, which by article 12 were to continue for the period of twenty years, and other annual payments provided for in other articles of the treaty, which annuities were given in lieu of a definite sum to be paid to the Choctaws by the Government in ADDITION to the western lands ceded the Choctaws by the United States. The ALLOTMENT OF LAND in Mississippi and Alabama was given to EVERY PERSON who desired to remain IN LIEU OF ANY RIGHT TO SHARE IN THESE ANNUITIES. But it was expressly provided in the above article that the PERSON REMAINING SHOULD NOT FORFEIT HIS RIGHT IN THE WESTERN LANDS BY REASON OF HIS FAILURE TO REMOVE. AND THEREFORE RESIDENCE ON THE LAND WAS NOT A CONDITION PRECEDENT, AND THEREFORE NOT NECESSARY TO ENABLE THE PERSON TO SHARE IN THE TRUST PROPERTY.

THE GRANT TO THE CHOCTAWS WAS IN PRÆSENTI.

"THERE BE, AND IS HEREBY GRANTED" are words of absolute donation and import a grant in præsenti. This court has held that they can have no other meaning. * * * They vest a present title. * * * (Leavenworth, etc., R. R. Co. v. U. S., 92 U. S., 733; 23 L. ed., 637; St. Joseph, etc., R. Co. v. Baldwin, 103 U. S. 427, 26 L. ed., 597; M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Kansas & Pacific Co., 97 U. S., 24 L. ed., 1097.)

"HAVE GIVEN AND GRANTED, AND BY THESE PRESENTS DO GIVE AND GRANT," the language used in the patent, constituted a GRANT IN PRÆSENTI, and they could have no other meaning.

It is a settled rule of construction that if from all the language of a statute or treaty it is apparent that Congress intended to convey an immediate interest it will be construed as a grant in præsenti. (New York Indians v. U. S., 170 U. S., pp. 15, 16; 42 L. ed., p. 932.)

In the case of Wallace v. Adams (143 Fed. Rep., 8th circuit, p. 723) Mr. Justice Sanborn, in referring to the cases reviewed and analyzed by the Supreme Court of the United States in its decision in New York Indians v. United States, says:

"The opinions in the cases cited are limited to rulings that grant to designated persons or classes of persons are grants in præsenti, and that after they have taken effect the rights to the property have vested so that they may not be lawfully destroyed by legislation without compensation."

In the case at bar the grant was in PRÆSENTI in FEE SIMPLE to the Choctaw Nation, as TRUSTEE for the use and benefit of a designated class of persons, i. e., ALL THOSE PERSONS COMPRISING THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY AT THE DATE OF THE RATIFICATION OF THE TREATY OF 1830, AND INURED TO THEIR DESCENDANTS.

Let us analyze the language used in the treaty and made the operative words of the grant. The grant was "to the Choctaw Nation * * * in fee simple to them and their descendants, to inure to them while they shall exist as a nation and live on it."

The personal pronoun "them," referring and relating to all those persons then comprising the Choctaw community of Indians, and the word "descendants," meaning:

"Any person who is descended from another; anyone who proceeds from the body of another, however remotely." (American and English Enc. of Law, p. 641.)

And the word "inure," meaning:

"1. To pass into use.

"2. To take or have effect.

"3. To serve the use or benefit of." (Bouvier and Universal dictionaries.)

The grant, was, therefore, IN PRÆSENTI in FEE SIMPLE to the Choctaw Nation as TRUSTEE for the use and benefit of all THOSE PERSONS THEN COMPRISING THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY OF INDIANS AND ANY PERSON DESCENDED FROM THEM OR WHO PROCEEDED FROM THE BODY OF THEM, HOWEVER REMOTELY, and no other person.

CHOCTAW NATION HELD LANDS AS TRUSTEE.

The draft of the treaty prepared by the Choctaws and as amended by President Jackson, which formed the basis of the negotiations which resulted in this treaty, the Journal record of the negotiations leading up to the signing thereof, hereinbefore set out, and the language used in the second article of the treaty as ratified, clearly import an intention on the part of both of the contracting parties to CREATE A TRUST and to LIMIT THE TRUST PROPERTY exclusively to the USE and BENEFIT of all THOSE PERSONS THEN COMPRISING THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

But even if the language of the treaty admitted of doubtful construction, it must be given the construction which is most favorable to the Indians.

"THE LANGUAGE USED IN TREATIES WITH INDIANS SHOULD NEVER BE CONSTRUED TO THEIR PREJUDICE." (Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet., 582; 8 L. ed., 508.)

"When a treaty admits of two constructions, one restricting as to the rights that may be claimed under it and the other liberal, the latter is to be preferred." (Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet., 242.) SUCH IS THE SETTLED RULE OF THIS COURT."

So said Mr. Justice Swayne in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Hauenstein v. Lynham (100 U. S., 47; 25 L. ed., 629) and citing the above referred to decision by Mr. Justice Story.

Certain it is that such was the understanding and intent of the grantor, the Government of the United States, for the language of the patent (prepared by the Government officers, presumably under the direction of that eminent lawyer, Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State) clearly created a trust by conveying the lands in fee simple to the Choctaw Nation for the use and benefit of them and their descendants. The habendum clause of the patent reads:

"To have and to hold the same, with all the rights, privileges, immunities, and appurtenances of whatsoever nature thereunto belonging, AS INTENDED 'TO BE CONVEYED' by the aforesaid article, 'IN FEE SIMPLE TO THEM AND THEIR DESCENDANTS, TO INURE TO THEM while they shall exist as a nation and live on it.'"

In the case of New York Indians v. United States (170 U. S., pp. 19–22; 42 L. ed., p. 934) Mr. Justice Brown, speaking for the court, said:

"The object of the habendum clause is said to be 'to set down again the name of the grantee, the estate that is to be made and limited, or the time that the grantee shall have in the thing granted or demised, and TO WHAT USE.' (Sheppard's Touchstone, 75.) It may explain, enlarge, or qualify, but can not contradict or defeat the estate granted by the premises, and where the grant is uncertain or indefinite concerning the estate intended to be vested in the grantee, the habendum performs the office of defining, qualifying, or controlling it." (Jones, Real Prop., 563; Devlin, Deeds, 215.)

The words "AS INTENDED TO BE CONVEYED IN FEE SIMPLE TO THEM AND THEIR DESCENDANTS," and the word "INURE" (meaning "to serve to the use or benefit of") were sufficient to fasten a trust upon the conscience of the trust donee. In the case of Randolph v. East Birmingham Lamp Company (Am. St. Rep., vol. 53, p. 67; 104 Ala., 355) Mr. Justice Haralson says:

"IN ALL CASES, as has been held, POWERS OR TRUSTS MUST BE CONSTRUED ACCORDING TO THE INTENTION OF THE PARTIES, TO BE GATHERED FROM THE WHOLE INSTRUMENT (1 Perry on Trusts, sec. 248; Kerr v. Verner, 66 Pa. St., 326; Guion v. Pickett, 42 Miss., 77). And when a gift in a will is expressed to be for the 'USE AND BENEFIT' of another, or to be at the disposal of the donee, for himself and children,' or 'toward his support and family,' or 'to enable the donee to provide for and maintain' his children, or where the gift is expressed to be made 'to the end' or 'TO THE INTENT' and the donee should apply it to certain purposes, the terms thus employed have been held sufficient to fasten a trust upon the conscience of the trust donee." (Hill on Trustees, *66, *67.)

The Choctaw Nation having been previously repeatedly recognized by the United States Government as fully possessed of authority to take and hold, in its own name and for its own use, real or personal property, and to sell, alienate, or otherwise dispose of same, and pass a valid title thereto, and being specially recognized as possessing such powers by the second and third articles of the treaty of 1830, there can be no question as to its authority to hold the property conveyed as TRUSTEE.

In the case of Commissioners of the Sinking Fund v. Walker (Am. Dec., vol. 38, p. 435, 6 Howard, 143) Mr. Chief Justice Sharkey, of the supreme court of Mississippi, says:

"Before the statute of uses, 27 Hen. VIII, c. 10, there was a limitation or restriction as to those who could stand seized to uses, but since the passage of that statute trusts have been adopted to supply the place of uses, and the former inability to stand seized to a use no longer prevails. The general rule now is that all persons capable of confidences and of holding real or personal property may hold as trustees. CORPORATIONS MAY NOW HOLD AS TRUSTEES, although they could not be seized to a use before the statute." (Willis on Trustees, 32–38, Law Lib. * * *)

Continuing, the justice says:

"A trust is said to be 'an obligation upon a person arising out of a confidence reposed in him to apply property faithfully and according to such confidence.' (Willis on Trustees, 2.) To constitute a direct trust there must be a conveyance or transfer to a person capable of holding it; there must also be an object or fund transferred and a cestui que trust or purpose to which the trust fund is to be applied. NO PARTICULAR WORDS ARE NECESSARY TO CONSTITUTE A TRUST, BUT IF IT BE THE PLAIN INTENTION OF THE PARTIES TO CREATE A TRUST IT WILL BE REGARDED AS SUCH."

In the case of Estate of Smith (Am. State Rep., vol. 27, p. 641; 144 Pa. State, 428) Mr. Justice Clark says:

"THERE IS NO CERTAIN FORM REQUIRED IN THE CREATION OF A TRUST. * * * If the declaration be in writing, it is not essential, as a general rule, THAT IT SHOULD BE IN ANY PARTICULAR FORM. IT MAY BE COUCHED IN ANY LANGUAGE WHICH IS SUFFICIENTLY EXPRESSIVE OF THE INTENTION TO CREATE A TRUST. * * * 'Three things, it has been said, must concur to raise a trust—sufficient words to create it, a definite subject, and a certain or ascertained object; and to these requisites may be added another, viz, that the terms of the trust should be sufficiently declared.' (Bispham's Equity, 65, citing Cruwys v. Colman, 9 Ves., 323; Knight v. Boughton, 11 Clark & F., 513. * * *.) The intention must be plainly manifest and not derived from loose and equivocal expressions of parties, made at different times and upon different occasions, but any words which indicate with sufficient certainty a purpose to create a trust will be effective in so doing. It is not necessary that the terms 'trust' and 'trustee' should be used. The donor need not say, in so many words, 'I declare myself a trustee,' but he must do something which is equivalent to it and use expressions which have that meaning, for however anxious the court may be to carry out a man's intention, it is not at liberty to construe words otherwise than according to their proper meaning." (Richard v. Delbridge, L. R., 18 Eq., 11–13.)

In Hearley v. Nicholson (L. R., 19 Eq., 233) Vice-Chancellor Bacon says:

"It is not necessary that the declaration of a trust should be in terms explicit, but what I take the law to require is, that the donor should have evinced by his acts, which admit of no other interpretation, that he himself had ceased to be, and that some other person had become, the beneficial owner of the subject of the gift or transfer, and that such legal right of it, if any, as he retained was held in trust for the donee."

"The one thing necessary," says the same learned judge in Warriner v. Rogers (L. R., 16 Eq., 340), "to give validity to a declaration of trust, the indispensable thing, I take to be that the donor or grantor, or whatever he may be called SHOULD HAVE ABSOLUTELY PARTED WITH THAT INTEREST WHICH HAD BEEN HIS UP TO THE TIME OF THE DECLARATION, SHOULD HAVE EFFECTUALLY CHANGED HIS RIGHT IN THAT RESPECT, AND PUT THE PROPERTY OUT OF HIS POWER, AT LEAST IN THE WAY OF INTEREST." The acts or words relied upon must be unequivocal, plainly implying that the person holds the property as trustee. (Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y., 134; 31 Am. Rep., 446. * * *)

The trust created was not only for the USE and BENEFIT of those persons then in esse and members of the Choctaw community in 1830, but was equally for the use and benefit of "DESCENDANTS" YET UNBORN. It is not necessary that the cestui que trust should be in existence in order to create a trust estate. The designation of a trustee capable of taking the legal title to the lands and the designation of a person or CLASS OF PERSONS, for whose benefit the trust was created, was sufficient. In the case of Salem Capital Flour Mills Company v. Stayton Water-Ditch and Canal Company (Fed. Rep., vol. 33, p. 153) the court says:

"The natural persons constituting this association, partnership, or company, and calling themselves collectively the 'Wallamet Woolen Manufacturing Company,' were in existence at the date of the deed and capable of taking the beneficiary interest in the grant. THE DESCRIPTION OF THEM AS STOCKHOLDERS IN 'A CERTAIN JOINT STOCK COMPANY WAS A SUFFICIENT DESIGNATION OF THEM. (Friedman v. Goodwin McAll., 149.) But if this were otherwise, and THERE WAS NO CESTUI QUE TRUST OR USE IN EXISTENCE AT THE DATE OF THE DEED, nor until the actual incorporation of the woolen company in the December following, THE OBJECTION IS NOT WELL TAKEN. Mr. Washburn (2 Washb. Real Prop., 3d ed., 173), after a careful review of the authorities, says: 'IT MAY BE LAID DOWN AS A GENERAL PROPOSITION THAT IT IS NOT NECESSARY, IN ORDER TO CREATE A TRUST ESTATE, THAT A CESTUI QUE TRUST SHOULD BE NAMED WHO IS IN BEING.' And again (Id., 198) he says: 'A TRUST MAY BE VALID AND EFFECTUAL WHERE A TRUSTEE IS NAMED, ALTHOUGH THE CESTUI QUE TRUST MAY NOT THEN BE IN ESSE, PROVIDED SUCH CESTUI QUE TRUST SUBSEQUENTLY CAME INTO BEING.' (See also on this point Ashhurst v. Given, 5 Watts and S., 328; Urket v. Coryell, id., 60.)"

In the case of Heermans v. Schmaltz (Fed. Rep., vol. 7, pp. 573, 574) the court says:

"As to all the beneficiaries named in the supplementary instrument, there can be no doubt that the trust is sufficiently expressed and defined; but it is claimed that the persons who are to take under the second clause of the instrument, and those who are to receive property under the residuary clause, in case any of the persons named therein die before the decease of the grantor, should have been designated by name, and this omission leaves the trust so far unexpressed and undefined as to invalidate the instrument as a conveyance in trust. I am unable to concur in that view. Most of the ultimate recipients of the property named and the proportions they are to receive are stated.

"The trusts are all clearly defined. In the two instances in which it is provided that distribution shall be made among the children of certain persons there is designation of A CLASS OF BENEFICIARIES. The grantor in such a case could not know when the trust is created, who of the class whom he desired to share in his property might be living at his death, or the names of such persons, or whether there would be children of some other beneficiary named surviving him; and I do not think it is the meaning or intention of the statute that the failure to name in every instance the person whom he might desire in certain contingencies to ultimately share in his estate—THE CLASS IN WHICH SUCH PERSON WOULD BELONG SPECIFICALLY DESIGNATED—should be held to defeat the conveyance as a valid trust instrument, on the ground that it does not fully express and clearly define the trust; and on the whole, I am of the opinion that by the instruments in question an active trust, valid under the statute, was created, and that the plaintiff was made the trustee of an express trust, clothed with the legal title to the premises in controversy."

PROPERTY IN CONTROVERSY REPEATEDLY DECLARED BY CONGRESS, ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS, AND THE COURTS TO BE "TRUST PROPERTY."

Not only have the words "AS INTENDED TO BE CONVEYED" and the word "INURE" (meaning to serve to the use or benefit of), as used in both the treaty and the grant ALWAYS BEEN HELD by the courts AS FASTENING A TRUST UPON THE CONSCIENCE OF THE TRUST DONEE—the Choctaw Nation—but the property in controversy has been repeatedly declared to be TRUST property in the reports of Congress, in the reports of administrative officers, and in the decisions of the highest court of this land.

Chief Justice Fuller, in the statement of fact in the case of Stephens v. Cherokee Nation (174 U. S. 43 L. ed., p. 1043), refers to and quotes from a report of a Senate committee, composed of Senators TELLER, of Colorado; Platt, of Connecticut, and Roach, of South Dakota, which visited the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, under Senate resolution adopted March 29, 1894, which report was submitted to the Senate May 7, 1894, and is set out in full in Senate Report No. 377, Fifty-third Congress, second session, and is in part as follows:

"As we have said, THE TITLE TO THESE LANDS IS HELD BY THE TRIBE IN TRUST FOR THE PEOPLE. We have shown that this TRUST is not being properly executed, nor will it be left to the Indians, and the question arises: What is the duty of the Government of the United States with reference to this TRUST? While we have recognized these tribes as dependent nations, the Government has likewise recognized its guardianship over the Indians and its obligations to protect them in their PROPERTY and personal rights.

"Is it possible because the Government has lodged the TITLE IN THE TRIBE IN TRUST that it is without power to compel the execution of the TRUST in accordance with the plain provisions of the treaty concerning such trust? Whatever power Congress possessed over the Indians as semidependent nations, or as persons within its jurisdiction, it still possesses, notwithstanding the several treaties may have stipulated that the Government would not exercise such power, and therefore Congress may deal with this question as if there had been no legislation save that which provided for the execution of the patent to the tribes.

"If the determination of the question whether the TRUST is or is not being properly executed is ONE FOR THE COURTS and not for the legislative department of the Government, then Congress can provide by law how such questions shall be determined and how such TRUST shall be administered, if it is determined that it is not now being properly administered.

"It is apparent to all who are conversant with the present condition in the Indian Territory that their system of government can not continue. It is not only non-American, but it is radically wrong, and a change is imperatively demanded in the interest of the Indian and whites alike, and such change can not be much longer delayed. The situation grows worse and will continue to grow worse. There can be no modification of the system. It can not be reformed. It must be abandoned and a better one substituted. That it will be difficult to do your committee freely admit, but because it is a difficult task is no reason why Congress should not at the earliest possible moment address itself to this question."

Chief Justice Fuller then quotes from a report made by the Dawes Commission on November 18, 1905, which concludes as follows:

"The Commission is compelled by the evidence forced upon them during their examination into the administration of the so-called governments in this Territory to report that these governments in all their branches are wholly corrupt, irresponsible, and unworthy to be longer trusted with the care and control of the MONEY AND OTHER PROPERTY OF INDIAN CITIZENS, much less their lives, which they scarcely pretend to protect."

Such was the condition Congress sought to remedy by its legislative enactments, and such condition would have been remedied and claimants given their rightful, equal share in the common trust property in controversy had the administrative officers conformed to the plain provisions of the law under which they were proceeding. It is because of the failure of the administrative officers to divide the property in conformity with the plain mandate of the statute that claimants have been denied their proper rights.

BENEFICIARIES UNDER TRUST.

The trust thus created was not for the exclusive benefit of full bloods or persons of mixed Indian and white blood, but was for the exclusive benefit of all persons who were members of the Choctaw community of Indians at the date of the ratification of the treaty and their descendants. If it had been the intention of the contracting parties to limit the grant exclusively to full bloods or to persons of mixed Indian and white blood, apt words to that end would have been used. In the case of Sloan v. United States (95 Fed. Rep., 197) the question presented was whether Indians of mixed blood were to be considered "Indians" under a statute directing the allotment of lands to "Indians" of the Omaha tribe. In passing upon this question Mr. Justice Shiras said:

"It confers the right to an allotment upon the Indians of the Omaha tribe. It makes no discrimination with respect to the mixed bloods. It must have been well known to Congress, as it unquestionably was to the Omaha tribe, that there was residing at that time upon this reservation, as members of the tribe, many persons of mixed blood, and IF IT WAS THE PURPOSE OF THE PARTIES TO EXCLUDE FROM THE BENEFIT OF THE ACT ALL PERSONS WHO WERE NOT INDIANS OF PURE BLOOD, APT WORDS TO THAT END WOULD HAVE BEEN USED."

The condition existing at the date of the ratification of the treaty must continue to the time of the distribution of the property. In the case of the New York Indians v. United States, the court in determining who were entitled to share in funds derived from the sale of lands conveyed in fee simple by a grant in præsenti to the Eight Nations of New York Indians, said (40 Court of Claims, pp. 556–557):

"Consequently, the court must adopt a rule of descent or participation which would embrace all persons whom it was the policy of the United States to remove, and this rule being ex necessitate rei, once established must continue. A court can not have one rule for one period of time, and another for another period of time. The white wife and her children born between 1838 and 1860 were as much Indians within the intent of the treaty as any full-blood Indian in the Six Nations, and what was the rule during that period of time must continue to be the rule up to the time of the judgment or the satisfaction of it; that is to say, the children of white mothers and Indian fathers affiliated with the tribe must be reckoned as Indians. The court must look upon the community and its members as such, and can not turn aside into the genealogy of individuals or be turned aside by the peculiarities of Indian laws and customs. THIS IS NOT A QUESTION OF INDIAN CITIZENSHIP OR TRIBAL CUSTOM, OR COMMUNAL OWNERSHIP IN INDIAN PROPERTY, BUT SIMPLY

A QUESTION OF A CONTRACT, AND OF THE INTENT OF THOSE WHO ENTERED INTO IT."

What was the condition existing at the date of the ratification of the treaty? Was the Choctaw community composed exclusively of full-blood Indians or were the members of the community then, as now, possessed of an admixture of the white and black races?

These questions are removed from the domain of controversy by reference to volume 7 of the American State Papers (public lands). That volume contains a list of those members of the Choctaw community of Indians who selected reserves of land in Mississippi under the treaty of 1830 and was compiled in September, 1831. On page 77 appears the names of persons of mixed Indian and negro blood under the heading, "NAMES OF INDIANS OWNING FARMS." In this list are the names of Sally Tom, with the notation "a free woman;" Joshua O'Rare, with the notation "a mulatto; married Sally Tom's daughter and lives with Sally Tom;" William Lightfoot, "a mulatto, half Indian and half negro;" Jim Tom, "half-breed negro; has an Indian wife;" James Blue, "a negro man; had an Indian wife; lives below the factory." Many other references are made therein to persons of mixed Indian blood. Indeed, in the year 1831, when this list was compiled by the Indian chiefs and approved by Government officers, a large percentage of the persons comprising the Choctaw community of Indians were either of mixed Indian and white or Indian and negro blood, and in many instances, as appears from the schedule, recognized members of the Choctaw community were not possessed of any Indian blood, being wholly of negro or white blood. The one and only essential requisite to full membership in the community of those affiliated with the Choctaw tribe was that he or she be a free person. Thus to-day the only essential requisite to participate in the tribal property of the Choctaws is descent from a person who was a member of the Choctaw community in 1830. The question of slavery having been eliminated, it is no longer a question for consideration.

The word "descendants" was advisedly used in the treaty, for at the date of its ratification the Choctaw people were living in a state of nature. The marital ties existing among them were not regarded with the same solemnity that they are in civilized communities to-day—illicit intercourse, as we now understand it, being a common practice—men and women marrying and unmarrying at pleasure under the crude customs of the Choctaws. The mere living together of a man and a woman constituted a valid marriage, and the abandonment of the woman by the man constituted a valid divorce; but the ties of consanguinity were strictly acknowledged; children became possessed of all their natural rights, and family tradition traced them to their remotest lengths. (See Wall v. Williamson, 11 Ala., 828; Johnson v. Johnson's Admr., 9 Mo. Rep., p. 88; Robinson's History of America, book 4.)

It was unquestionably within the power of the Government of the United States—the sovereign—to make the grant, as it did, "TO THEM AND THEIR DESCENDANTS," so as to include as beneficiaries ANY PERSON WHO PROCEEDED FROM THE BODY OF A RECOGNIZED MEMBER OF THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY AT THE DATE OF THE RATIFICATION OF THE TREATY, HOWEVER REMOTELY.

In the case of J. T. Minor, jr., v. Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations (cited in the decision of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior in the Perry case, reported in Departmental Decisions Affecting the Work of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, p. 167), the Choctaw and Chickasaw Citizenship Court held:

"Taking this to be true, then, if there was no marriage the children of Lucy were illegitimate, begotten by a full-blood Choctaw Indian. This court has held in a case (Althea Paul et al. v. Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations) that when there was a natural child begotten by a Chickasaw Indian of a white woman the child was entitled to enrollment as a member of the tribe by reason of the Chickasaw blood of his father."

In the Joe and Dillard Perry case (reported in the Departmental Decisions Affecting the Work of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, p. 168) the Assistant Attorney-General construed the rights of descendants of those persons who composed the Choctaw community in 1830 as follows:

"The treaty right (referring to the treaty of 1830) was to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations and their descendants. Descendants, as pointed out in the case of James W. Shirley, is a term of wider significance than 'heirs' or 'legitimate issue,' and includes those springing from an ancestor, whether legitimate issue or not."

In the case of Van Buren v. Dash (30 N. Y., pp. 393–422), per Dino, Chief Justice, the court said:

"The word 'DESCENDANTS' has reference to the genealogy of the succession of persons in the family relation, and has no necessary connection with the laws of inheritance."

Thus the word "descendants," as used in the treaty of 1830, provided for the succession to the property rights of the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

SOURCE OF CHICKASAW TITLE—TREATY OF 1837.

Negotiations between the Choctaws and Chickasaws and the Government of the United States, running over a period of nearly seven years, culminated on the 17th day of January, 1837, in the Choctaws and Chickasaws entering into a treaty which was ratified by the Senate of the United States and proclaimed as a law on March 24, 1837 (11 Stat. L., 573), by the first article of which it was "agreed by the Choctaws that the Chickasaws shall have the privilege of forming a district within the limits of their (Choctaw) country, TO BE HELD ON THE SAME TERMS THAT THE CHOCTAWS NOW HOLD IT, except the right of disposing of it (which is held in common with the Choctaws and Chickasaws), to be called the Chickasaw district of the Choctaw Nation."

Throughout all the negotiations leading up to the signing of this treaty the Indians had been proceeding under the direction of the Government officers, who had counseled, advised, and urged upon the Choctaws and Chickasaws the advisability of entering into such an agreement. The Chickasaws had been informed by Secretary of War Eaton and General Coffee that the laws of the United States prohibited the purchase by them of any part of the Choctaw lands unless the agreement be entered into in the presence of commissioners representing the Government. (Senate Doc. 512, vol. 4, p. 17, 23d Cong., 1st sess.) It was undoubtedly for these reasons that the Government became a party to the treaty, as well as to provide for a method of settling disputes which might arise over the construction of any provision of the treaty, as appears from article 4, and, lastly, to bring to a successful termination, by the aid of the Government's superior counsel, the negotiations which had been so long pending.

Secretary of War Eaton, in a communication addressed to General Coffee, who was supervising the negotiations between the Choctaws and Chickasaws, under date of March 31, 1831 (Senate Doc. 512, vol. 2, p. 274, 23d Cong., 1st sess.), sets out fully the plan which the Government officers were attempting to induce the Choctaws and Chickasaws to accept, and which plan was evidently embodied in the treaty of 1837. Secretary of War Eaton wrote in part as follows:

"We are much embarrassed on this subject. The Chickasaws, with all their desire to emigrate, can not do so. If a suitable and approved home can not be provided, they must abide where they are and suffer all the inconveniences which subjection to State laws must impose. Within the Choctaw country there is abundant room for both tribes. Their population we estimated at 12,000; but let it be taken at 15,000 and let the Chickasaws, as the fact is, be set down at 5,000, which will be in all 20,000. The country claimed by the Choctaws contains not less than 16,000,000 acres, which will be 800 acres to each soul, an amount ample, and more than sufficient, for all their wants.

"But while the Choctaws are disposed to receive the Chickasaws, the latter are not willing to become a part of their tribe, and desire to remain, as heretofore, a separate, independent people. An arrangement to this effect, with the concurrence of both parties, might perhaps be made. Let the Chickasaws have a district within their country, to be subject to their own rules, with the understanding that each of the other three districts of the Choctaws under their respective chiefs shall also be governed independently by their laws. That a general chief shall be appointed every two or three years, with delegates from each district, to make laws for the whole. Under such an arrangement, properly guarded, the Chickasaws may be satisfied."

This correspondence clearly indicates that the plan of Secretary of War Eaton (who had direct supervision of all Indian affairs), contemplated the purchase by the Chickasaws of an equal, individual interest with the Choctaws in all lands conveyed to the Choctaws under the treaty of 1830. The treaty reflects the plan outlined in the letter of Secretary of War Eaton to General Coffee. By the first article of the treaty we find the Chickasaws purchasing the privilege from the Choctaws of forming a district within the limits of their country "to be held on the same terms that the Choctaws now hold it," except the right of disposing of it (which is held in common by the Choctaws and Chickasaws), to be called the Chickasaw district of the Choctaw Nation, provision for equal representation of the Chickasaws in the Choctaw general council, and the placing of the Chickasaws on an equal footing in every other respect with any of the other districts of the Choctaw Nation, excepting only a voice in the management of the consideration which was paid the Choctaws for the privileges acquired by the Chickasaws under this treaty; the Chickasaw people were to be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the Choctaws, to be subject to the same laws to which the Choctaws were. By the third article of the treaty, the Chickasaws agreed to pay the Choctaws, as a consideration for the rights and privileges acquired, the sum of $530,000. By the fifth article it is declared to be the intention of the Choctaws and Chickasaws that they shall have equal rights and privileges to settle in whatever district they may think proper and to be eligible to all the different offices of the Choctaw Nation, and a vote on the same terms in whatever district they may settle, excepting only that the Choctaws should not vote "for officers in relation to the residue of the Chickasaw fund." The express provision that the Choctaws and Chickasaws should settle in any district in the nation clearly indicates that neither the Choctaws nor the Chickasaws contemplated other than the purchase by the Chickasaws of an individual interest in the Choctaw Nation equal to the individual property rights of the Choctaws.

By the terms and provisions of this treaty the Chickasaws became a part of the Choctaws, being admitted into the Choctaw Nation on equal terms with the Choctaws (excepting only that the Choctaws and Chickasaws reserved the right to manage their separate funds), and thus the Chickasaws and their descendants became equal beneficiaries with the Choctaws and their descendants under the treaty of 1830, while the trustee—the Choctaw Nation—thereafter held the legal title to the property for the use and benefit of both people and their descendants.

TREATY OF 1855.

The preamble of the treaty of June 22, 1855 (11 Stat. L., 611), states the object for which the treaty was negotiated to be:

"Whereas the political connection heretofore existing between the Choctaw and the Chickasaw tribes of Indians has given rise to unhappy and injurious dissensions and controversies among them, which render necessary a readjustment of their relations to each other and to the United States; and

"Whereas the United States desire that the Choctaw Indians shall relinquish all claim to any territory west of the one hundredth degree of west longitude, and also to make provisions for the permanent settlement within the Choctaw country of the Wichita and certain other tribes or bands of Indians, for which purpose the Choctaws and Chickasaws are willing to lease, on reasonable terms, to the United States, that portion of their common territory which is west of the ninety-eighth degree of west longitude; and

"Whereas the Choctaws contend that, by a just and fair construction of the treaty of September 27, 1830, they are of right entitled to the net proceeds of the lands ceded by them to the United States, under said treaty, and have proposed that the question of their right to the same, together with the whole subject-matter of their unsettled claims, whether national or individual, against the United States, arising under various provisions of said treaty, shall be referred to the Senate of the United States for final adjudication and adjustment; and

"Whereas it is necessary for the simplification and better understanding of the relations between the United States and the Choctaw Indians that all their subsisting treaty stipulations be embodied in one comprehensive instrument."

By article 1 of this treaty the boundaries of the Choctaw and Chickasaw country are defined and the Government forever secures and guarantees the lands embraced within the defined boundaries to the "members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes * * * to be held in common, so that each and every member of either tribe shall have an equal undivided interest in the whole."

Article 2 creates a district for the Chickasaws and defines the boundaries thereof.

Article 3 provides that "the remainder of the country held in common by the Choctaws and Chickasaws shall constitute the Choctaw district."

Article 4 provides that the "government and laws now in operation and not incompatible with this instrument" shall be and remain in full force and effect within the limits of the Chickasaw district until the Chickasaws shall adopt a constitution and enact laws superseding, abrogating, or changing the same.

Article 5 provides that "the Choctaws and Chickasaws shall have the right freely to settle in either the Choctaw or Chickasaw district, and shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizens of the district in which they settle."

Article 8 provides that "in consideration of the foregoing stipulations" the Chickasaws shall pay the Choctaws the sum of $150,000.

The remaining articles are not material to the questions at issue in this case.

Counsel for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations and the United States contend that the second paragraph of article 1 of this treaty, which provides:

"And pursuant to an act of Congress approved May 28, 1830, the United States do hereby forever secure and guarantee the lands embraced within the said limits to the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, their HEIRS and successors TO BE HELD IN COMMON, SO THAT EACH AND EVERY MEMBER OF EITHER TRIBE SHALL HAVE AN EQUAL UNDIVIDED INTEREST IN THE WHOLE: Provided, however, No part thereof shall ever be sold without the consent of both tribes, and that said land shall revert to the United States if said Indians and their heirs become extinct or abandon the same."

was in effect a new grant to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations by the United States of the lands ceded the Choctaws in fee simple under the treaty of 1830; and that under this alleged new grant only such persons were entitled to share in the common property as were thereafter recognized by the tribal authorities as members of the tribes and their heirs.

We respectfully submit that the contention of counsel for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations and the United States is wholly fallacious and untenable.

In the case of the United States v. Choctaw Nation (179 U. S., 522, 45 L. ed., 300, 303), Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, reviews the Choctaw title in determining a controversy arising out of the treaty of 1866 (eleven years after this treaty was ratified), and says that the title of the Choctaws was acquired by the patent issued in 1842, in pursuance of the terms and provisions of the treaty of 1830, and attaches significance to the grant, which he says was a SPECIAL GRANT, and that it became binding when accepted by the Choctaws.

Thus, on the day this treaty was ratified, we find the Choctaw Nation holding the legal title in fee as TRUSTEE under the grant made in pursuance with the treaty of 1830 for the beneficiaries named in the treaties of 1830 and 1837. The Government of the United States having absolutely and forever passed all its title to these lands by the special grant in fee simple, made in 1842, in pursuance with the terms and provisions of the treaty of 1830, it had no title which it could confer in the year 1855. The lands having been granted to the Choctaw Nation as trustee, for the use and benefit of a designated class of persons, it could not divert the trust to any other use than that for which it was created by the treaty and consummated by the grant. Nor was it the intention of the Government or the Choctaw Nation to do so. There is nothing contained in this treaty which indicates an intention, directly or indirectly, on the part of the Government of the United States, or the Choctaw Nation, acting as trustee, to attempt to make or receive a new grant.

The cession having been made to the Choctaws under the special treaty of 1830, the Chickasaws having purchased an individual right in the common property of the Choctaws equal to the individual holdings of the Choctaws by the treaty of 1837, and the Government having conveyed the lands in fee simple by the patent issued in 1842 in pursuance with the treaty of 1830, the act of Congress approved May 28, 1830, and referred to in the second paragraph of article 1 of this treaty, had, and could have, no bearing on the title to the lands in controversy. This paragraph was evidently inserted in the treaty through the ignorance or carelessness of the Government officers who drafted the instrument, and is not in harmony with the purposes for which the treaty was negotiated, which were mainly for the settlement of political differences between the Choctaws and Chickasaws and the settlement of the claims of the Choctaws against the Government of the United States. The words employed in this paragraph are without legal significance when applied to the common lands of the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

The American and English Encyclopedia of Law, in defining the word "heir," says:

"At common law an heir is he who is born or begotten in lawful wedlock, and upon whom the law casts an estate in lands, tenements, and hereditaments immediately upon the death of the ancestor."

Could the death of an ancestor "cast an estate" in communal lands upon his "heirs," then members of these tribes, who acquired full right to participate in the tribal property by birth? As the ancestor acquired only a life interest in the usufruct of the land, and as that right terminated with his demise, he never had an interest in the communal lands possible of being transmitted to his "heirs." He enjoyed the fruits of his birthright during his life and his rights in the communal lands terminated instantaneously with his demise and passed back to the living beneficiaries under the grant.

It is reasonable to assume, therefore, that this provision was inserted by the Government officers, who prepared the treaty, in the belief that the cession was made under the act of Congress approved May 28, 1830.

TREATY OF 1866.

Counsel for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations and the United States contend that by article 3 of the treaty of 1866 every person theretofore held in slavery by the Choctaws and Chickasaws should receive 40 acres of the common lands of the said Indians, and that similar allotments should be made to their descendants; that the limited property rights conferred upon ex-slaves and their descendants by this treaty was intended, and did, extinguish the greater property rights to which a person was entitled by reason of his descent from a recognized member of the Choctaw community as it existed in 1830 or the Chickasaw community as it existed in 1837.

We respectfully submit that the contention of the attorneys for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations and the Government of the United States with reference to article 3 of the treaty of 1866 is wholly fallacious.

Article 3 of the treaty of 1866 provides as follows (14 Stat. L., 769):

"ARTICLE 3. The Choctaws and Chickasaws, in consideration of the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, hereby cede to the United States the territory west of the 98th degree west longitude, known as 'the leased district,' provided that the said sum shall be invested and held by the United States at an interest not less than five per cent in trust for the said nations until the legislatures of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, shall have made such laws, rules, and regulations as may be necessary to give all persons of African descent resident in the said nations at the date of the treaty of Fort Smith and their descendants, HERETOFORE HELD IN SLAVERY among said nations, all the rights, privileges, and immunities, including the right of suffrage of citizens of said nations, except in the annuities, moneys, and public domain claimed by or belonging to said nations, respectively, and also to give to such persons who were residents, each as aforesaid, and their descendants, forty acres of the land of said nations on the same terms as the Choctaws and Chickasaws, to be selected on the survey of said land after the Choctaws and Chickasaws and Kansas Indians have made their selections as herein provided; and immediately on the enactment of such laws, rules, and regulations the said sum of three hundred thousand dollars shall be paid to the said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in the proportion of three-fourths to the former and one-fourth to the latter, less such sum at the rate of one hundred dollars per capita, as shall be sufficient to pay such persons of African descent before referred to as within ninety days after the passage of such laws, rules, and regulations shall elect to remove and actually remove from the said nations, respectively. And should the said laws, rules, and regulations not be made by the legislatures of the said nations, respectively, within two years from the ratification of this treaty, then the said sum of three hundred thousand dollars shall cease to be held in trust for the said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and be held for the use and benefit of such of said persons of African descent as the United States shall remove from the said territory in such manner as the United States shall deem proper, the United States agreeing within ninety days from the expiration of the said two years to remove from said nations all such persons of African descent as may be willing to remove; those remaining or returning after having been removed from said nations to have no benefit of said sum of three hundred thousand dollars or any part thereof, but shall be upon the same footing as other citizens of the United States in the said nations."

Under the laws, rules, and regulations required by the treaty to be adopted, what rights were to be conferred and upon what persons? Persons of African descent and held in slavery at the date of the treaty of Fort Smith (September 15, 1865) were given their freedom and were to be given full citizenship in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, with limited property rights, of 40 acres of land only. The descendants of those persons held in slavery at the date of the treaty of Fort Smith and born prior to the ratification of the treaty of 1866 were given similar rights. The descendant of any Choctaw or Chickasaw slave born after the ratification of the treaty of 1866 neither acquired nor could acquire either citizenship or property rights in either nation under or by virtue of the laws, rules, and regulations required by the treaty to be subsequently adopted by the respective Indian governments. Therefore, the word "descendants" as it appears in this treaty, does not in the remotest degree conflict with the rights conferred upon "descendants" of Indians under the treaties of 1830 and 1837 in cases of intermarriage, after the ratification of the treaty of 1866, between Indians and the descendants of ex-slaves. Descent from a member of the Choctaw community as it existed in 1830 or the Chickasaw community in 1837 entitled such descendant to participate equally with any full blood in the tribal property, while the descendant of the ex-slave, free of any Indian blood, born after the ratification of the treaty of 1866, acquired no property right of any kind in the Choctaw or Chickasaw Nation by reason of such descent. By this treaty rights were conferred upon persons theretofore held in slavery who had no rights under any previous treaty.

ADOPTION OF LAWS, RULES, AND REGULATIONS BY CHOCTAWS.

The Choctaw Nation on May 21, 1863, duly enacted a law in strict compliance with the terms of the treaty of 1866, hereinabove set out, the first section of which reads as follows:

"Be it enacted by the general council of the Choctaw Nation assembled, That all persons of African descent, resident in the Choctaw Nation at the date of the treaty of Fort Smith, September 13, 1865, and their descendants formerly held in slavery by the Choctaws, are hereby declared to be entitled to and invested with all the rights, privileges, and immunities, including the rights of suffrage, of citizens of the Choctaw Nation, except in the annuity moneys and the public domain of the nation."

CHICKASAWS REFUSED TO ADOPT LAWS, RULES, AND REGULATIONS.

The Chickasaw Nation refused, and ever since has refused, to comply with the provisions of the third article of the treaty of 1866 relative to the recognition of ex-slaves and their descendants THERETOFORE HELD IN SLAVERY. THUS NO CHICKASAW EX-SLAVE OR HIS OR HER DESCENDANT ACQUIRED ANY RIGHTS BY VIRTUE OF THIS TREATY IN THE PROPERTY OF THE CHICKASAWS.

Thus the person of African descent HELD IN SLAVERY ON AND PRIOR TO THE 13TH DAY OF SEPTEMBER, 1865, and resident in the nation on that date, AND HIS OR HER DESCENDANTS, BORN PRIOR TO THE TREATY OF 1866, AND THERETOFORE HELD IN SLAVERY, AND SUCH PERSONS ONLY became citizens in law and in fact of the Choctaw Nation with all the rights, privileges, and immunities of any full-blood Choctaw, except the right to participate equally with the Choctaw by blood and descent in the lands and moneys of the tribe. THESE RIGHTS DID NOT PASS TO THEIR DESCENDANTS BORN AFTER THE TREATY OF 1866. THEY COULD NOT BE TRANSMITTED TO THEIR CHILDREN THEREAFTER BORN, and such children were permitted to remain in the nation only during good behavior. Section 7 of the act of the Choctaw council—hereinabove referred to—enacted in conformity with the treaty of 1866 provides:

"Be it further enacted, That intermarriage with such freedmen of African descent, who were formerly held as slaves of the Choctaws and have become citizens, shall not confer any rights of citizenship in this nation, and all freedmen who have married or who may hereafter marry freedwomen who have become citizens of the Choctaw Nation, are subject to the permit laws and allowed to remain during good behavior only."

CONSTITUTION EXTENDED TO INDIAN TERRITORY.

Thus we find in the year 1890 the Choctaw and Chickasaw people holding the lands and other tribal property in common under the unchanged terms of the treaties of 1830 and 1837 and the patent issued in 1842. In this year the right of every person who was a member of the Choctaw community in 1830, or the Chickasaw community in 1837, or who was a descendant of any such person, to share in the common trust property of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, became a constitutional property right and was surrounded and protected by all the guaranties of that instrument.

The act of May 2, 1890, provided:

"The Constitution of the United States * * * shall have the same force and effect in the Indian Territory as elsewhere in the United States." (26 Stat. L., 96.)

Where the Constitution has been once formally extended by Congress to Territories neither Congress nor the Territorial legislature can enact laws inconsistent therewith. (Downs v. Bidwell, 182 U. S., 244, 45 L. ed., p. 1100.)

The fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution provides:

"No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

PROPERTY RIGHTS SECURED TO PLAINTIFFS BY THE CONSTITUTION.

The Constitution of the United States applied to the property as well as to the persons of the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

In defining a property right Mr. Justice Bradley, in the case of Campbell v. Holt (115 U. S. 620, 29 L. ed., 487), said:

"That clause of the amendment which declared that 'no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law' was intended to protect every valuable right which man has.

"The words 'life, liberty, and property' are constitutional terms, and are to be taken in their broadest sense. They indicate the three great subdivisions of all civil right. The term 'property' in this clause embraces all valuable interests which a man may possess outside of himself; that is to say, outside of his life and liberty. It is not confined to mere tangible property, but extends to every species of vested right. In my judgment, it would be a very narrow and technical construction to hold otherwise. In an advanced civilization like ours a very large proportion of the property of individuals is not visible and tangible, but consists in rights and claims against others or against the Government itself."

In the case of Bluejacket v. Commissioners of Johnson County (72 U. S., 18 L. ed., 672) Mr. Justice Davis says:

"If they (Indians) have outlived many things, they have not outlived the protection afforded by the Constitution, treaties, and laws of Congress."

In the case of Doe Mann v. Wilson (23 How., 457, 16 L. ed., 584) Mr. Justice Catron, in delivering the opinion of the court, which is cited and relied upon by the Supreme Court in the case of Jones v. Meehan (175 U. S., p. 56), said:

"The INDIAN TITLE IS PROPERTY, and alienable unless the treaty had prohibited its sale." (Comet v. Winton, 2 Yerg., 148; Blair and Johnson v. Pathkiller, 2 Yerg., 414.)

A vested right, as defined by Chancellor Kent, is:

"An estate is vested when there is an immediate right of present enjoyment or a present fixed right of future enjoyment." (4 Kent's Com., 202.)

Are not the individual interests of claimants in the communal properties of the Choctaws and Chickasaws vested interests? Have not the claimants in the case at bar, at all times since their birth, possessed the right of present enjoyment, and, by the terms of the grant, do they not have a fixed right of future enjoyment? If so, their right is a vested right.

In the case of Chae Chan Ping v. The United States, the Supreme Court defines a vested property right as distinguished from a political right. Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, said (130 U. S., 32 L. ed., 1077):

"THE RIGHTS AND INTERESTS CREATED BY A TREATY WHICH HAVE BECOME SO VESTED THAT ITS EXPIRATION OR ABROGATION WILL NOT DESTROY OR IMPAIR THEM ARE SUCH AS ARE CONNECTED WITH AND LIE IN PROPERTY CAPABLE OF SALE AND TRANSFER OR OTHER DISPOSITION, NOT SUCH AS ARE PERSONAL AND UNTRANSFERABLE IN THEIR CHARACTER. Thus, in the Head Money cases the court speaks of certain rights being in some instances conferred upon the citizens or subjects of one nation residing in the territorial limits of the other, which are 'capable of enforcement as between private parties in the courts of the country.' 'An illustration of this character,' it adds, 'is found in treaties which regulate the mutual rights of citizens and subjects of the contracting nations in regard to rights of property by descent or inheritance when the individuals concerned are aliens' (112 U. S., 580, 598, 628, 798, 803). The passage cited by counsel from the language of Mr. Justice Washington in Society for the Propagation of the Gospel v. New Haven (21 U. S., 8; Wheat., 424, 493, 5:662) also illustrates this doctrine. Here the learned justice observes that 'IF REAL ESTATE BE PURCHASED OR SECURED UNDER A TREATY IT WOULD BE MOST MISCHIEVOUS TO ADMIT THAT THE EXTINGUISHMENT OF THE TREATY EXTINGUISHED THE RIGHT TO SUCH ESTATE. IN TRUTH, IT NO MORE AFFECTS SUCH RIGHTS THAN THE REPEAL OF A MUNICIPAL LAW AFFECTS RIGHTS ACQUIRED UNDER IT.' OF THIS DOCTRINE THERE CAN BE NO QUESTION IN THIS COURT. But far different is this case, where a continued suspension of the exercise of a governmental power is insisted upon as a right, because by the favor and consent of the Government it has not heretofore been exerted with respect to the claimants or to the class to which he belongs. BETWEEN PROPERTY RIGHTS NOT AFFECTED BY THE TERMINATION OR ABROGATION OF A TREATY AND EXPECTATIONS OF BENEFITS FROM THE CONTINUANCE OF EXISTING LEGISLATION THERE IS AS WIDE A DIFFERENCE AS BETWEEN REALIZATION AND HOPES."

CLAIMANTS COULD ONLY HAVE BEEN LEGALLY DISPOSSESSED OF THEIR PROPERTY RIGHTS BY DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

Claimants having a vested undivided property right in the common property of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, they could only have been divested of that right by DUE PROCESS OF LAW, as provided by the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution. The findings and judgments of the Commission and Secretary of the Interior, which resulted in the denial by the executive officers of claimants' full property rights were LEGISLATIVE findings and judgments, and so declared by the circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, in the case of Wallace v. Adams (143 Fed. Rep., p. 723). We respectfully submit that a legislative finding and decree can not disturb a vested property right and that such a commission can not render judgments and decrees judicial in effect, within the meaning of "due process of law."

In the case of Hurtado v. People of California, Mr. Justice Matthews, delivering the opinion of the court, defines "due process of law," and his reasoning therein has been adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States and embodied in its decisions in almost every case involving this question that has come before the court from that day to the present.

He says (110 U. S., pp. 516, 558; 28 L. ed., p. 238):

"Due process of law in the latter (fifth amendment) refers to that law of the land which derives its authority from the legislative powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States, exercised within the limits therein prescribed, and interpreted according to the principles of the common law. In the fourteenth amendment, by parity of reasoning, it refers to that law of the land in each State which derives its authority from the inherent and reserved powers of the State, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions, and the greatest security for which resides in the right of the people to make their own laws and alter them at pleasure. 'The fourteenth amendment,' as was said by Mr. Justice Bradley in Missouri v. Lewis (supra), 'does not profess to secure all persons in the United States the benefit of the same laws and the same remedies. Great diversities in these respects may exist in two States separated only by an imaginary line. On one side of this line there may be a right of trial by jury, and on the other side no such right. Each State prescribes its own modes of judicial proceeding.'

"But it is not to be supposed that these legislative powers are absolute and despotic, and that the amendment prescribing due process of law is too vague and indefinite to operate as a practical restraint. It is not every act, legislative in form, that is law. Law is something more than mere will exerted as an act of power. It must be not a special rule for a particular person or a particular case, but, in the language of Mr. Webster, in his familiar definition, 'The general law, a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial,' so 'that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society,' and thus excluding, as not due process of law, acts of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, acts of confiscation, acts reversing judgments and acts directly transferring one man's estate to another, LEGISLATIVE JUDGMENTS AND DECREES and other similar specials, partial, and arbitrary exertions of power under the forms of legislation. Arbitrary power, enforcing its edicts to the injury of the persons and property of its subjects, is not law, whether manifested as the decree of a personal monarch or of an impersonal multitude. And the limitations imposed by our constitutional law upon the action of governments, both State and national, are essential to the preservation of public and private rights, notwithstanding the representative character of our political institutions. The enforcement of these limitations by judicial process is the device of self-governing communities to protect the rights of individuals and minorities, as well against the power of numbers as against the violence of public agents transcending the limits of lawful authority, even when acting in the name and wielding the force of the Government."

RIGHTS OF ALL PERSONS UNDER TREATIES PROTECTED BY CHOCTAW CONSTITUTION.

In 1860 the Choctaw people adopted a constitution and laws. The constitution provided:

"We, the representatives of the people inhabiting the Choctaw Nation * * * assembled in convention at the town of Doaksville, on Wednesday, the 11th day of January, 1860, in pursuance of an act of the general council, approved October 24, 1859, in order to secure to the citizens thereof the right of life, liberty, and property, do ordain and establish the following constitution and form of government, and do mutually agree with each other to form ourselves into a free and independent nation, NOT INCONSISTENT WITH THE CONSTITUTION, TREATIES, AND LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES, by the name of the Choctaw Nation." (See pp. 5 and 6, Choctaw Laws, 1894.)

By this constitution the Choctaw people expressly recognize the binding force and effect of the treaties with, and the laws of, the United States.

Under this provision of the Choctaw constitution no valid law could be enacted that was in conflict with any treaty of the United States (Robb v. Burney, 168 U. S., 218). No person could, by a Choctaw law, be divested of a right of which he or she was possessed under a treaty with the Government of the United States. If, therefore, any law was ever enacted by the Choctaw Nation attempting to exclude any child of either a Choctaw man or woman from participation in the tribal property it would have been unconstitutional, null, and void. But we have been unable to find any law enacted at any time by the Choctaw or Chickasaw governments which attempted, directly or indirectly, to exclude children of recognized members of the tribes from participating in the distribution of the common property, or from being enrolled as unqualified members of the tribes.

The Chickasaw constitution contained a provision similar to that contained in the Choctaw constitution, being almost in the same language. Therefore no Chickasaw could be excluded from a right flowing from, or growing out of, a treaty with the United States by any enactment of the Chickasaw legislature.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW CORRUPT INDIAN ADMINISTRATION OF TRUST PROPERTY RESULTED IN THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT INTERFERING.

About the year 1890 representations were made to Congress that the conditions existing in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations had become intolerable; that neither life nor property was secure under the laws of the tribes; that the officials of the tribes had become corrupt, and that practically the entire Indian estates were being held by a few influential and corrupt individuals to the exclusion of the great majority of the people, who were equally entitled to share in the property under the treaties and the grant.

On the 29th day of March, 1894, the Senate adopted a resolution authorizing the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, or any subcommittee thereof appointed by its chairman, to inquire into the conditions existing in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and clothing said committee, or any subcommittee thereof appointed, with full power to visit the Territories, to take testimony, to require the attendance of witnesses, and to administer oaths.

A subcommittee was appointed, consisting of Senators TELLER, Platt, and Roach, which committee visited Indian Territory and conducted a searching investigation into existing conditions, and on May 7 submitted its report to the Senate. In this report the committee states that the census of 1890 gave the total number of Indians living in the Five Civilized Tribes at 50,055. Continuing, the report says:

"But, in addition to this 50,055 Indians, there are large numbers of claimants to Indian citizenship who may or may not be Indians within the provisions of our treaties. These are put down as 18,636, AND INCLUDE THE COLORED PEOPLE, WHOSE RIGHTS OF INDIAN CITIZENSHIP ARE ADMITTED, AS WELL AS A LARGE NUMBER WHO ARE NOT RECOGNIZED BY THE INDIAN AUTHORITIES AS ENTITLED TO THE RIGHTS OF INDIAN CITIZENSHIP, BUT WHO CLAIM TO BE LEGALLY INDIAN CITIZENS."

According to the census report, then, the population is as follows:

"Indians, 50,055; COLORED INDIANS, COLORED CLAIMANTS TO INDIAN CITIZENSHIP, FREEDMEN, AND COLORED, WHOLLY OR IN PART, 18,636."

In referring to the title held by the Choctaw Nation, the committee says:

"The theory of the Government was when it made TITLE to the lands in the Indian Territory to the Indian tribes as bodies politic that the TITLE WAS HELD FOR ALL OF THE INDIANS OF SUCH TRIBE. All were to be the equal participators in the benefits to be derived from such holding. But we find in practice such is not the case. A few enterprising citizens of the tribe—frequently not Indians by blood, but by intermarriage—have, in fact, become the practical owners of the best and greatest part of these lands, while the title still remains in the tribe, theoretically, for all; YET IN FACT, THE GREAT BODY OF THE TRIBE DERIVES NO MORE BENEFIT FROM THEIR TITLE THAN THE NEIGHBORS IN KANSAS, ARKANSAS, OR MISSOURI.

"According to Indian law (doubtless the work of the most of the enterprising class we have named) an Indian citizen may appropriate any of the unoccupied public domain that he chooses to cultivate. In practice he does not cultivate it, but secures a white man to do so, who takes the land on lease of the Indian for one or more years, according to the provision of the law of the tribe where taken. The white man breaks the ground, fences it, builds on it, and occupies it as a tenant of the Indian, and pays rental either in part of the crop or in cash, as he may agree with his landlord.

"Instances came to our notice of Indians who had as high as 100 tenants, and we heard of one case where it was said the Indian citizen, a citizen by marriage, had 400 holdings, amounting to about 20,000 acres of farm land. We believe that may be an exceptional case, but that individual Indians have large numbers of tenants on land not subduced and put into cultivation by the Indian but by his white tenant, and that these holdings are not for the benefit of the whole people, but of the few enterprising ones, is admitted by all. The monopoly is so great that in the most wealthy and progressive tribe your committee were told that 100 persons had appropriated fully one-half of the best land. This class of citizens take the very best agricultural lands and leave the poorer land to the less enterprising citizens, who in many instances farm only a few acres in the districts farthest removed from the railroads and the civilized centers.

"As we have said, the TITLE to these lands is held by the tribe in TRUST for the people. WE HAVE SHOWN THAT THIS TRUST IS NOT BEING PROPERLY EXECUTED, NOR WILL IT BE IF LEFT TO THE INDIANS, and the question arises, What is the duty of the Government of the United States with reference to this TRUST? While we have recognized these tribes as dependent nations, the Government has likewise recognized its guardianship over the Indians and its obligations TO PROTECT THEM IN THEIR PROPERTY AND PERSONAL RIGHTS.

"If the tribe fails to administer its TRUST PROPERLY by securing to all the people of the tribe EQUITABLE PARTICIPATION IN THE COMMON PROPERTY OF THE TRIBE, there appears to be no redress for the Indian so deprived of his rights, unless the Government does interfere to administer such TRUST.

"IS IT POSSIBLE BECAUSE THE GOVERNMENT HAS LODGED THE TITLE IN THE TRIBE IN TRUST THAT IT IS WITHOUT POWER TO COMPEL THE EXECUTION OF THE TRUST IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE PLAIN PROVISIONS OF THE TREATY CONCERNING SUCH TRUST?

"Whatever power Congress possessed over the Indians as semidependent nations, or as persons within its jurisdiction, it still possesses; notwithstanding the several treaties may have stipulated that the Government would not exercise such power, and therefore Congress may deal with this question as if there had been no legislation save that which provided for the execution of the patent to the tribes.

"If the determination of the question whether the TRUST is or is not being properly executed is one for the courts and not for the legislative department of the Government, then Congress can provide by law how such question shall be determined and how such TRUST shall be administered if it is determined that it is not now being properly administered.

"It is apparent to all who are conversant with the present condition in the Indian Territory that their system of government can not continue. It is not only non-American, but it is radically wrong, and a change is imperatively demanded in the interest of the Indian and whites alike, and such change can not be much longer delayed. The situation grows worse and will continue to grow worse. There can be no modification of the system. It can not be reformed. It must be abandoned and a better one substituted. That it will be difficult to do your committee freely admit, but because it is a difficult task is no reason why Congress should not at the earliest possible moment address itself to this question.

"We do not care to at this time suggest what, in our judgment, will be the proper step for Congress to take on this matter, for the Commission created by an act of Congress, and commonly known as the Dawes Commission, is now in the Indian Territory, with the purpose of submitting to the several tribes of that Territory some proposition for the change in the present very unsatisfactory condition of that country. We prefer to wait and see whether this difficult and delicate subject may not be disposed of by an agreement with the several tribes of that Territory. But if the Indians decline to treat with that Commission, and decline to consider any change in the present condition of their titles and government, the United States must, without their aid and without waiting for their approval, settle this question of the character and condition of their land tenures and establish a government over whites and Indians of that Territory, in accordance with the principles of our Constitution and laws.

"As the matters submitted are so complicated and of such grave importance, the committee has thought proper to submit this preliminary report, and hopes, upon further investigation, to be able to make such further and more specific recommendation as to necessary legislation as will lead to a satisfactory solution of this difficult question."

ACT OF JUNE 10, 1896.

The intolerable conditions existing in these nations or tribes, as disclosed by this report, resulted in the enactment of legislation which had for its object the dissolution of the tribal governments and the division of the TRUST PROPERTY in severalty among THOSE PERSONS ENTITLED THERETO UNDER THE TREATIES with the tribes.

The first important act was the act approved June 10, 1896. This act provided for the continuance of a Commission theretofore created, and known as the Dawes Commission, and directed the Commission as follows:

"That said Commission is further authorized and directed to proceed at once to hear and determine the application of all persons who may apply to them for citizenship in any of said nations, and after said hearing they shall determine the right of said applicant to be so admitted and enrolled: Provided, however, That such application shall be made to such Commissioners within three months after the passage of this act. The said Commission shall decide all such applications within ninety days after the same shall be made. That in determining all such applications said Commission shall respect ALL LAWS OF THE SEVERAL NATIONS OR TRIBES NOT INCONSISTENT WITH THE LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES, AND ALL TREATIES WITH EITHER OF SAID NATIONS OR TRIBES, and shall give due force and effect to the rolls, usages, and customs of each of said nations or tribes: And provided further, That the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes as now existing are hereby confirmed, and any person who shall claim to be entitled to be added to said rolls as a citizen of either of said tribes and whose right thereto has either been denied or not acted upon, or any citizen who may within three months from and after the passage of this act desire such citizenship, may apply to the legally constituted court or committee designated by the several tribes for such citizenship, and such court or committee shall determine such application within thirty days from the date thereof.

"In the performance of such duties said Commission shall have power and authority to administer oaths, to issue process for and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to send for persons and papers, and all depositions and affidavits, and other evidence in any form whatsoever heretofore taken where the witnesses giving said testimony are dead or now residing beyond the limits of said Territory, and to use every fair and reasonable means within their reach for the purpose of determining the rights of persons claiming such citizenship, or to protect any of said nations from fraud or wrong, and the rolls so prepared by them shall be hereafter held and considered to be true and correct rolls of persons entitled to the rights of citizenship in said several tribes: Provided, That if the tribe, or any person, be aggrieved with the decision of the tribal authorities or the Commission provided for in this act, it or he may appeal from such decision to the United States district court: Provided, however, That the appeal shall be taken within sixty days, and the judgment of the court shall be final.

"That the said Commission, after the expiration of six months, shall cause a complete roll of citizenship of each of said nations to be made up from their records, and add thereto the names of citizens whose right may be conferred under this act, and said rolls shall be, and are hereby, made rolls of citizenship of said nations or tribes, subject, however, to the determination of the United States courts, as provided herein."

DEPARTMENTAL INTERPRETATION OF THIS LAW.

The Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior, in a decision rendered March 24, 1905, in the case of "Mary Elizabeth Martin, applicant for enrollment as a citizen of the Choctaw Nation," defines the powers of the Commission and the rights of applicants under this law to be:

"The Commission had no authority to * * * deny citizenship to those entitled thereto under treaties and laws with, and of, the United States, or under Indian laws, usages, and customs not inconsistent therewith. * * *

"These powers (referring to the powers of the Commission under this act) were to admit to citizenship persons claiming such right whose right was denied or not recognized by the tribal authorities."

ACT OF JUNE 7, 1897, DEFINING "ROLLS OF CITIZENSHIP."

As there had been numerous tribal rolls prepared in both the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations by different tribal officials at different times and for various purposes, a question arose as to what particular rolls were confirmed by the act hereinabove set out. Accordingly Congress, in an act approved June 7, 1897, defined the words "rolls of citizenship," as used in the act of June 10, 1896, to mean the—

"Last authenticated rolls of each tribe which have been approved by the council of the nation, and the descendents of those appearing on such rolls, and such additional names and their descendants as have been subsequently added." * * *

By operation of this act the name of every descendant of every person whose name appeared on any one of "the authenticated rolls of each tribe" was placed on the roll on which the name of his ancestor appeared by operation of law. In the opinion in the case of Mary Elizabeth Martin, above referred to, the Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior so holds. Says he:

"By this act (June 7, 1897) descendants of persons on the roll were defined and regarded as on the roll where their parents were found, whether themselves actually on such rolls or not and though born after the roll was made."

But few applications of persons entitled to enrollment were made under the act of June 10, 1896. The number of persons embraced in applications filed under that act for enrollment as Choctaws was 7,137, of which 1,268 were enrolled. Applications for the enrollment of 1,812 persons claiming citizenship in the Chickasaw Nation were submitted and 318 were enrolled. The total number of citizens enrolled up to June 30, 1906, in both nations is approximately 35,000.

NO TRIBAL ROLLS CONFIRMED.

The act of June 7, 1897, did not authorize the Commission to receive applications. The tribal rolls approved by the council of each nation had been confirmed, and the Commission was directed to write the names of the descendants of the ancestor whose name appeared on any confirmed tribal roll on the roll on which the name of the ancestor appeared. The tribal officials refused to deliver over to the Commission the various tribal rolls. The Commission discovered that no tribal roll had been approved, as required by the act of June 7, 1897, and that, therefore, there were in reality no confirmed tribal rolls. The facts as then ascertained by the Commission were subsequently reported to the Department in the case of Bettie Lewis, which is referred to in the Mary Elizabeth Martin case hereinabove quoted.

In this case the Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior refers to and sets out the correspondence of the Commission as follows:

"The report of January 24, 1903, in the case of Bettie Lewis, above mentioned, is to the effect that the Commission never have been furnished any authenticated rolls of citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, and it has no possession or knowledge of any rolls of their citizens made during or prior to 1885, and the Commission has never been furnished any roll prior to the leased district payment roll of 1893, which the Commission uses, together with the 1896 census roll, as the basis for identification of applicants. The Commission, at considerable length, state their correspondence with the executives of these tribes, and its own efforts of investigation.

"The principal chief of the Choctaw Nation advised the Commission, July 17, 1897, that he had refused to approve the last revised roll made in accordance with an act of council (October, 1896), because he is satisfied there are some names thereon 'that have been registered through fraud or misrepresentation.' The Governor of the Chickasaw Nation, July 22, 1897, stated that 'we have only one authenticated roll of citizens, and that is the one approved by the legislature in 1896.' The Commission also mention having discovered and obtained from individual memoranda rolls made by Commissioners Ishatubby and Maytubby, of Choctaw Indians residing in the nation, and states that 'IT HAS BEEN THE PRACTICE OF TRIBAL OFFICIALS CHARGED WITH ANY DUTY IN CONNECTION WITH TRIBAL ROLLS TO WITHDRAW THEM FROM THE EXECUTIVE OFFICES, WHEN NECESSARY, AND TO RETAIN THEM AMONG THEIR PERSONAL EFFECTS.'

"THE COMMISSION STATES ITS CLEAR CONVICTION TO BE 'THAT THERE HAD NEVER, PRIOR TO THE APPROVAL OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF JUNE 10, 1896, BEEN ANY ROLLS OF THE CITIZENS OF THE CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS WHICH HAD BEEN RATIFIED AND CONFIRMED BY THE LEGISLATIVE BODIES OF THESE TWO NATIONS OR HAD RECEIVED THE APPROVAL OF THE CHIEF EXECUTIVES. IT IS MATTER OF GENERAL OPINION IN SAID NATIONS THAT THE ROLLS MADE PRIOR TO THAT TIME WERE MERELY ROLLS MADE UP SEPARATELY ACCORDING TO COUNTIES AND DISTRICTS, BY INDIVIDUAL CENSUS TAKERS IN SUCH COUNTIES AND DISTRICTS, AND WHICH WERE NEVER BROUGHT TOGETHER OR CONSOLIDATED SO AS TO FORM A COMPLETE ROLL OF TRIBAL MEMBERS.'"

The Choctaw and Chickasaw nations denied the constitutional power of Congress to enact legislation dissolving their tribal governments. The Commission was powerless to prepare tribal rolls. Citizens of the nations would not make applications to the Commission for enrollment. The tribal governments refused the Commission access to their tribal records. The Commission could not compel them to deliver up tribal records essential to a proper adjudication of applications for citizenship. Accordingly the Commission reported the facts to the committees of Congress, stating that it was rendered powerless to perform the work which Congress intended it to perform, viz, the preparation of correct and complete Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship rolls.

REPORT OF HOUSE INDIAN COMMITTEE ON PENDING BILL.

The report of the House Indian Committee on the then pending bill, made March 1, 1898, and being entitled "Laws for the Indian Territory," to accompany H. R. 8581 (Rept. No. 593, 55th Cong., 2d sess.), and submitted by Representative CURTIS, explains the necessity for additional legislation to enable the Commission to enroll all persons entitled to enrollment as citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, as follows:

"Provision has heretofore been made for the making of rolls of citizenship of the various tribes, but the Commission authorized to do the work is of the opinion that to do equal justice to all concerned they should have additional authority, and we believe this measure provides for the settlement of the question of citizenship, so that when the rolls are made the interest of all concerned will have been fully protected and this vexed and important question will be settled forever."

Acting upon this advice, Congress enacted the bill reported, being the act approved June 28, 1898, giving the Commission plenary power to prepare tribal rolls. It conferred upon it the power to compel persons to appear before it, to subpœna witnesses and to compel them to testify under oath, to compel the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribal governments to deliver over to the Commission tribal rolls and records. In fact, the Commission was given every power necessary to the preparation by it of COMPLETE AND CORRECT TRIBAL ROLLS and directed by the statute to so do. Here are the powers and the instructions given it under and by the statute:

"That in making the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes as required by law, * * * said Commission is authorized and directed to make correct rolls of citizens by blood of all the other tribes (including the Choctaws and Chickasaws), eliminating from the tribal rolls such names as may have been placed thereon by fraud or without authority of law, enrolling such only as may have lawful right thereto, and their descendants, born since such rolls were made, with such intermarried white persons as may be entitled to Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship under the treaties and laws of said tribes.

"Said Commission shall make such rolls descriptive of the persons thereon, so that they may be thereby identified, and it is authorized to take a census of each of said tribes, or to adopt any other means by them deemed necessary to enable them to make such rolls. They shall have access to all rolls and records of the several tribes, and the United States court in Indian Territory shall have jurisdiction to compel the officers of the tribal government and custodians of such rolls and records to deliver same to said Commission, and on their refusal or failure to do so to punish them as for contempt; as also to require all citizens of said tribes, and who should be so enrolled, to appear before said Commission for enrollment at such times and places as may be fixed by said Commission, and to enforce obedience of all others concerned so far as the same may be necessary to enable said Commission to make rolls as herein required, and to punish anyone who may in any manner or by any means obstruct said work.

"It shall make a correct roll of all Choctaw freedmen entitled to citizenship under the treaties and laws of the Choctaw Nation, and all their descendants born to them since the date of the treaty.

"It shall make a correct roll of Chickasaw freedmen entitled to any rights or benefits under the treaty made in 1866 between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes and their descendants born to them since the date of said treaty, and 40 acres of land, including their present residences and improvements, shall be allotted to each, to be selected, held, and used by them until their rights under said treaty shall be determined in such manner as shall be hereafter provided by Congress.

"No person shall be enrolled who has not heretofore removed to and in good faith settled in the nation in which he claims citizenship.

"The members of said Commission shall, in performing all duties required of them by law, have authority to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and send for persons and papers, and any person who shall willfully and knowingly make any false affidavit or oath to any material fact or matter before any member of said Commission or before any other officer authorized to administer oaths, to any affidavit or other paper to be filed or oath taken before said Commission, shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished as for such offense.

"The rolls so made, when approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be final, and the persons whose names are found thereon, with their descendants thereafter born to them, with such persons as may intermarry according to tribal laws * * * shall alone constitute the several tribes which they represent."

PART OF ENACTMENT UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Congress could not legally restrict the right to share in the trust property to those who had "HERETOFORE REMOVED TO AND IN GOOD FAITH SETTLED IN THE NATION IN WHICH HE CLAIMS CITIZENSHIP." A residence upon the land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations was not one of the conditions of the grant, which was in fee simple to the Choctaw Nation in trust for the exclusive use and benefit of a designated class of people. Congress, fifty-five years after the grant was made, could not impose this additional requirement and thereby exclude a part of the designated class for whose benefit the trust was enacted. By the treaty it was expressly provided that those persons who did not remove to the western reserve SHOULD NOT LOSE ANY OF THEIR RIGHTS IN THIS TRUST PROPERTY, and Congress could not constitutionally say, as it did say in this enactment, that unless they had removed they should forfeit their interest in this trust property.

The rights of claimants in this trust property were VESTED RIGHTS, and it is elementary law that Congress can not disturb a VESTED RIGHT. But if Congress had possessed the constitutional power to have restricted property rights in this trust property to those persons who actually resided in the land it would not knowingly have done so, for such would have been contrary to the long-established policy of the Government, by which policy inducements were offered to reservation Indians who would abandon their tribal relations and adopt the ways of civilized life. One of the solemn assurances given every such Indian was that he should not lose any of his rights to share in any annuities, moneys, or lands belonging to their tribes by abandoning their tribal relations and adopting the ways of civilized life. The act of May 20, 1862 (18 Stat. L., 420), provided:

INDIAN HOMESTEADS AND ALLOTMENTS OF LANDS TO INDIANS IN SEVERALTY.

"SEC. 15. (Certain Indians entitled to benefit of homestead laws.) That any Indian born in the United States who is the head of a family or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and who has abandoned or may hereafter abandon his tribal relations, shall, on making satisfactory proof of such abandonment, under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to the benefits of the act entitled 'An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain,' approved May 20, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, except that the provisions of the eighth section of the said act shall not be held to apply to entries made under this act: Provided, however, That the title to lands acquired by any Indian by virtue hereof shall not be subject to alienation or incumbrance, either by voluntary conveyance or the judgment, decree, or order of any court, and shall be and remain inalienable for a period of five years from the date of the patent issued therefor: Provided, THAT ANY SUCH INDIAN SHALL BE ENTITLED TO HIS DISTRIBUTIVE SHARE OF ALL ANNUITIES, TRIBAL FUNDS, LANDS, AND OTHER PROPERTY THE SAME AS THOUGH HE HAD MAINTAINED HIS TRIBAL RELATIONS; AND ANY TRANSFER, ALIENATION, OR INCUMBRANCE OF ANY INTEREST HE MAY HOLD OR CLAIM BY REASON OF HIS FORMER TRIBAL RELATIONS SHALL BE VOID."

Sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act of August 9, 1888 (25 Stat. L., 392), and section 1 of the Indian appropriation act of June 7, 1897 (30 Stat. L., 90), extended similar inducements and protection to Indian women and their children.

In the case of the reservation Indian, where the fee to the land is held by the United States, the Government can impose any requirement Congress may see fit to impose by enactment, but in the case of the TRUST PROPERTY in controversy Congress had no power to impose any requirements whatever in addition to those imposed in the treaty creating the TRUST, and RESIDENCE ON THE LAND WAS NOT ONE OF THE CONDITION OF THE GRANT.

ALLOTMENTS TO CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW FREEDMEN PURE GRATUITIES.

Again, the portion of the above-quoted enactment directing the Commission to enroll the descendants of Choctaw and Chickasaw ex-slaves born since the treaty of 1866 was unconstitutional, null, and void. They were expressly barred by the treaty of 1866. In the Chickasaw Nation NO PERSON HELD IN SLAVERY BY THE CHICKASAWS OR HIS OR HER DESCENDANT HAD ANY RIGHT IN THIS TRUST PROPERTY. This question has been adjudicated by the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States. It was referred to the Court of Claims by the act approved July 1, 1902, and that court held, in an opinion rendered April 4, 1904, that neither the Chickasaw freedmen nor their descendants WERE ENTITLED, UNDER THE TREATY OF 1866 OR ANY OTHER TREATY, TO ALLOTMENTS OF LAND, and subsequently rendered judgment against the United States in the sum of $130.16 for each allotment of 40 acres made to every freedman or his or her descendants out of this TRUST PROPERTY. The opinion of the Court of Claims was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case entitled: "Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations v. United States," and reported in 193 U. S., page 114.

In the Choctaw Nation the Government has ARBITRARILY ALLOTTED LANDS TO THE DESCENDANTS OF FREEDMEN BORN SINCE THE TREATY OF 1866, AND THEREBY CONFISCATED A PORTION OF THIS TRUST PROPERTY BY SHEER FORCE OF POWER AND GIVEN IT TO THESE NEGROES.

VALID PROVISIONS OF THE LAW.

It will be observed that the first sentence of this enactment directed the Commission:

"That in making the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes as required by law."

What was the law? It was the treaty under which the grant was made and by which the trust was created. That was the ONLY LAW for the guidance of the Commission to "make correct rolls of citizens by blood. * * *"

Did this mean full bloods or mixed bloods? It meant ANY PERSON possessed of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood, even down to the most attenuated proportions. It meant THEM AND THEIR DESCENDANTS TO THE REMOTEST DEGREE, for the act in order to be constitutional could not impair vested rights, and any other construction would have impaired vested rights.

The provision—

"Said Commission is authorized and directed to make correct rolls of citizens by blood, * * * eliminating from the tribal rolls such names as may have been placed thereon by fraud or without authority of law, enrolling such only as may have lawful right thereto and their descendants born since such rolls were made"—

did not mean that the Commission should secure and use exclusively the tribal rolls made by the corrupt officials of these tribes, but it meant that the Commission should secure and use ALL rolls made of the membership of these tribes. It meant what Assistant Attorney-General Van Devanter—in an official opinion rendered under date of March 17, 1899, for the guidance of the Commission in the preparation of these tribal rolls under this act of June 28, 1898, and which opinion was approved by the Secretary of the Interior and thereby became a law of the Department—said it meant when he construed and defined the above language to mean:

"The Commission was authorized and directed to enroll the persons indicated, and to investigate the right of all other persons whose names were found upon ANY TRIBAL ROLL, and to omit all such as may have been placed there by fraud or without authority of law. They were not authorized to add any name not found upon SOME ROLL of the tribe, except those of descendants of persons rightfully upon some roll."

But the Commission, in the face of these instructions, used only such rolls as were furnished it by these Indian officials as a basis for the preparation of the final citizenship rolls, notwithstanding the fact that at that very moment there were official rolls, numbering forty or fifty, prepared by Government officials and agents from time to time and running over a period of sixty years, and which were authentic and reliable rolls of the tribes in the custody and possession of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury.

ACT DID NOT REQUIRE SUBMISSION OF APPLICATION.

It will be observed that this act did not require the claimant to make an application to the Commission, but did direct the Commission to go out into the field and summon all persons claiming any rights in this trust property to appear before it, and the Commission was directed to examine them under oath, and the law clothed the Commission with ample power to compel every person appearing before it to testify under oath.

That it did not require the submission of an application appears from the opinion of Assistant Attorney-General Van Devanter hereinbefore cited, in which he says:

"The act of 1897 did not provide for new applications for citizenship. * * * Neither did the act of 1898 make any provisions for new applications for citizenship."

EXAMINATIONS NOT CONDUCTED AS DIRECTED BY THE DEPARTMENT.

Commissioner of Indian Affairs W. A. Jones, under date of July 25, 1899, prepared official instructions to the Commission for its guidance in the preparation of these tribal rolls, and on August 8, 1899, those instructions were approved by the Secretary of the Interior and thereby became a law of the Department. In those instructions the Commission was directed as follows:

"The rolls as made up by your Commission must, to become final, receive the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. It will therefore be necessary for you to make a record in all cases sufficient to enable this Office and the Department to take intelligent action in the premises, and especially in those cases where your decision either for or against the right of any person to have his name appear upon the roll is complained of.

"For the purpose of this record you will require each applicant for enrollment to present himself in person before the Commission at one of its appointments within the tribe in which such applicant claims right to enrollment, for examination under oath, his statements to be taken down by the Commission, upon which the Commission will determine his right to enrollment, and such record and action of the Commission will be preserved and transmitted with the rolls to be considered by this Office and the Department when the rolls made by the Commission are submitted for the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Tams Bixby, chairman of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, and who supervised the examination and enrollment of persons under this act of June 28, 1898, appeared before the select committee of the Senate at Muskogee on the night of November 16, 1906, and under oath testified as follows:

"Q. Were you in the field when applicants were examined and identified under the act of 1898?

"Commissioner BIXBY. I was in the Chickasaw Nation in the fall of 1898.

"Q. Were you in charge of the examination and identification of either the citizens by blood, freedmen, or intermarried?

"Commissioner BIXBY. I presided in the tent at which the applicants who claimed enrollment by reason of Chickasaw blood or Choctaw blood presented themselves.

"Q. Was everything that was said by the applicant at the time he or she appeared before you for enrollment entered upon the examination record, such as that [exhibiting paper to the witness]?

"Commissioner BIXBY. No, sir; not at all.

"Q. Such portions of their statement as you deemed proper to place upon it?

"Commissioner BIXBY. WE DID NOT TAKE ANY TESTIMONY IN OUR TENT AT ALL." (S. Rept. No. 5013, pt. 1, 59th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 498–500.)

A. S. McKennon, who was a member of the Commission in 1898 and 1899 appeared before the select committee of the Senate sitting at South McAlester in November, 1906, and under oath testified that he had charge of the work of the enrollment of persons of mixed Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian and negro blood. When asked by a member of the committee whether this class of persons were enrolled as freedmen, Commissioner McKennon replied:

"Yes, sir; I simply addressed myself to the task of determining whether they or their ancestors were slaves of the Chickasaws; if so, I enrolled them; if not, they were not entitled." (S. Rept. No. 5013, pt. 1, 59th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 946–947.)

When persons of mixed Indian and negro blood appeared before members of the Commission and demanded that they be examined as to their Indian blood, and insisted upon the Commission making a record of their statements, their requests were not only refused, but in some instances they were forcibly ejected from the tent in which full bloods and persons of mixed Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian and white blood were being enrolled, as will appear from the following affidavits:

AFFIDAVIT OF CHARLES COHEE.

[United States of America, Indian Territory, southern judicial district.]

Charles Cohee, first being duly sworn, on oath states that he is 57 years of age, a resident of the Chickasaw Nation, Ind. T., and lives at the town of Berwyn, in said nation and Territory; that he is enrolled as a Chickasaw freedman, and that on the 1st day of September, 1898, he was appointed by R. M. Harris, governor of the Chickasaw Nation, a member of the committee to sit with the Dawes Commission for the purpose of identifying applicants for enrollment as freedmen; that he was again appointed to the same position by Governor Johnson, in April, 1899, and that he worked every day with the Commission during their sittings in the Chickasaw Nation and most of the time during their sittings in the Choctaw Nation.

Affiant further states that at the beginning of the work the committee of which he was a member, in making statements to the Dawes Commission of the status of applicants, made particular mention of those who claimed to have Indian blood; that the applications of such persons claiming Indian blood were for a while received by the Commission, but that in a short time—about fifteen days after the committee began sittings—all such applications were rejected by the said Dawes Commission, and the committee of which affiant was a member was informed that those applicants who were born to slave mothers, or to negro women who were descended of slaves, were freedmen, and would be enrolled as such only, and the said committee was advised to discontinue hearing the statement of applicants as to their Indian blood, as in no case would they be enrolled as Indian citizens; and that therefore the said committee from that time on, with possibly a few exceptions, refused to hear statements of persons of mixed colored blood of their claim that they were possessed of Indian blood in any degree whatever; that the said committee from that time on, in stating to the Commission status of applicants, only made mention of such family relation as would establish their rights as freedmen, and made no mention whatever of the existence of Indian blood, although in many instances they knew applicants were possessed of such.

CHARLES COHEE.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 21st day of November, 1905.

[SEAL.] J. A. MCNAUGHT, Notary Public.

My commission expires March 17, 1909.

AFFIDAVIT OF W. L. BENNETT.

[United States of America, Indian Territory, southern district.]

W. L. Bennett, first being duly sworn, on oath states that he is 35 years old, a resident of the Chickasaw Nation, Indian Territory, and lives at the inland town of Woodford, in said nation.

Affiant further states that when the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes came down into Choctaw and Chickasaw country for the purpose of enrolling persons who claimed rights in either of the said nations, a committee of freedmen was appointed to act on behalf of the nation with said Commission for the purpose of aiding them in identifying persons entitled to enrollment as freedmen of the nations. He states that he accompanied said committee in the capacity of an employee and was with them continuously from the time they began their work at Stonewall, Ind T., until the Commission finished its work at Ardmore, Ind. T.

He further states that it was a rule of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes that when a person appeared in the tent wherein applications were received for enrollment as citizens by blood and who looked to be a freedman, he was not allowed to make application there, but was directed to another tent, in which application for enrollment as freedmen only was received. It was, further, a rule of said Commission that no person claiming either as a citizen by blood or as a freedman would be enrolled if their mother was a States woman. He states that this rule of the Commission, in as far as it affected freedmen, was shortly changed, and persons were enrolled as freedmen whether they descended as such from either mother or father, but that the rule was never changed, so far as affiant can now remember, in the matter of the enrollment of persons of negro blood who claimed descent from an Indian citizen.

Affiant further states that so far as he can now remember he does not recall a single instance in which an application was received by the Commissioner in charge of the tent wherein application was made for enrollment as citizens by blood, but that in each and every instance persons of mixed negro and Indian blood who appeared at that tent and asserted their rights to be enrolled as citizens of the Chickasaw Nation were directed to the freedmen tent.

Affiant states that hundreds of persons were thus prevented from making application for enrollment as citizens by blood of the Chickasaw Nation.

W. L. BENNETT.

AFFIDAVIT OF THOMAS NORMAN.

[United States of America, Indian Territory, southern district.]

Thomas Norman, first being duly sworn, on oath states that he is a practicing attorney at law at the present time, in good standing, with an office in Ardmore, Ind. T., of which place he is a resident.

Affiant further states that in 1898, when the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes was established in Ardmore for the purpose of receiving applications of persons claiming rights in the Chickasaw Nation, he was frequently before said Commission in behalf of applicants.

He states that the Commission had two or three different tents—one in which they enrolled persons claiming by blood, another in which they enrolled freedmen, and the third in which they enrolled persons claiming by intermarriage, adoption, etc.; that to his personal knowledge, when a person presented himself to the Commission in the tent where the enrollments by blood were being made, who had the appearance of a freedman, he was directed to the tent in which enrollments of freedmen were being made, and that the application of such persons were not received in the tent where enrollments by blood were made.

He further states that it became a matter of common knowledge that persons who were freedmen, or who had the appearance of freedmen, would be received by the Commission and allowed to make application in that tent only wherein freedmen as such were enrolled.

THOS. NORMAN.

[SEAL.] J. L. RIGGINS, Notary Public.

Commission expires January 27, 1910.

Even when persons of mixed Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian and negro blood attempted to make a record of their requests by addressing the Commission in writing, their communications were returned to them accompanied by a printed form and notice from the Commission that the Commission would not receive their applications for enrollment as Indians, BUT IF THEY WOULD FILL OUT THE BLANK FORM INCLOSED the Commission would enroll them as freedmen.

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"COMMISSION TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES,
"Muskogee, Ind. T., March 16, 1901.

"DEAR SIR: Receipt is hereby acknowledged of the application for enrollment as a citizen of the Choctaw Nation of George Butler, the infant son of Prince and Mary Butler, born April 3, 1900.

"The application is again returned for the reason as stated in the Commission's letter of the 23d of February. The mother of the child appears upon our records as listed for enrollment as a Chickasaw freedman. There is inclosed you herewith a new blank application, which you will have made out in conformity with the corrections made in lead pencil upon the application returned you herewith.

"Upon return of the new application in proper form for the enrollment of the child as a freedman, the matter will be given further consideration.

"Yours, truly,

_____ _____,
"Acting Chairman."

In order, however, to make their work of enrollment of this class of people final, the Commission examined many of them under oath SOLELY AS TO THEIR NEGRO BLOOD AND DESCENT FROM AN ANCESTRY ONCE HELD IN INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE AND DID NOT ASK THEM ONE QUESTION AS TO THEIR INDIAN BLOOD, as will appear from the examination records set out on pages 1514 to 1517, Senate Report No. 5013, part 2, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session.

Commissioner Tams Bixby testified under oath before the Senate committee at its hearing at Muskogee in November, 1906, that only persons of mixed Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian and negro blood WERE EXAMINED UNDER OATH AND THEIR TESTIMONY REDUCED TO WRITING, and that NO OTHER CLASS OF PERSONS WERE SUBJECTED TO SUCH EXAMINATION. (S. Report 5013, part 1, 59th Cong., 2d sess., p. 500:)

Commissioner McKennon testified (see Senate Report No. 5013, part 1, 59th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 946–947) that this class of people were examined solely as to their descent from ex-slaves.

It thus conclusively appears from the sworn testimony of the men who had charge of the work that the census rolls prepared, which were to form the basis for the final citizenship rolls, upon which this trust property was to be distributed, were not made either in conformity with the provisions of the statute or in conformity with the instructions of the Department. The rotten tribal rolls used by the Commission for the identification of the persons appearing before it were prepared by the same corrupt officials who were directly responsible for the interference on the part of the Government of the United States in the affairs of the Choctaws and Chickasaws in order to protect the rights of the great majority of the legal and equitable beneficiaries under the trust. From this polluted sewer was to ultimately spring CORRECT rolls of citizenship.

THE ACT OF MAY 31, 1900.

In May, 1900, an amendment was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill of that year, in conference, providing as follows:

"That said Commission shall continue to exercise all authority heretofore conferred on it by law. But it shall not receive, consider, or make any record of any application of any person for enrollment as a member of any tribe in Indian Territory who has not been a recognized citizen thereof and duly and lawfully enrolled or admitted as such, and its refusal of such application shall be final when approved by the Secretary of the Interior."

Bear in mind that the act of 1898 did not require the submission of an application; that the duty of ascertaining all the beneficiaries in this trust property devolved wholly upon the Commission. By this act of May 31, 1900, the Commission could not receive, consider, or make any record of an application submitted by any person who had not been a recognized citizen of the tribes and duly and lawfully enrolled by the Commission or by the courts—the latter under the act of June 10, 1896.

Either the author of this amendment did not realize its frightful results, or he deliberately sought by legislation and the use of all the power of the Government of the United States to exclude thousands of persons of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood who were in law, equity, and good conscience entitled to share in this tribal estate, and who had a vested right therein, and thereby increase the individual shares of those who had been enrolled, largely through favoritism, by the Commission.

ACT APPROVED JULY 1, 1902.

The exclusion act of May 31, 1900, was followed by a provision inserted in the supplemental agreement approved July 1, 1902. That agreement provided as follows:

"The rolls of the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizens and Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen shall be made by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes in strict compliance with the act of Congress approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stats., 495), and the act of Congress approved May 31, 1900 (31 Stats., 221), except as herein otherwise provided. * * *"

If the author of this provision had deliberately attempted to so confuse the language therein employed as to render it utterly meaningless he could not have succeeded more admirably. How could the rolls of citizenship be made in strict compliance with an act that did not require the submission of an application, but directed the Commission to ascertain all the rightful beneficiaries and enroll them, and provided that when the rolls were "so made," and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, they shall be final, and at the same time be made in strict compliance with an act that PROHIBITED THE COMMISSION FROM RECEIVING, CONSIDERING, OR MAKING ANY RECORD OF ANY APPLICATION OF ANY PERSON NOT THERETOFORE ENROLLED.

This was a beautiful dish of legal hodgepodge or succotash to be served up to a Commission composed of laymen; for at the time this work was being done there was not a lawyer on the Commission. We submit that no living human being can with absolute certainty tell what the meaning of this language is, or what the powers of the Commission were under it, and this will never be known until decided by a court of competent jurisdiction.

PREPARATION OF FINAL CITIZENSHIP ROLLS.

From these census rolls, notoriously inaccurate and incomplete, the Commission of January 1, 1902, commenced the work of the preparation of the final citizenship rolls. No testimony had been taken and made of record; no person had been examined under oath, except persons of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian and negro blood, and their examination being conducted solely for the purpose of ascertaining their descent from an ancestry once held in slavery; thousands of persons whom it was the duty of the Comimssion under positive law to enroll were refused enrollment and denied the right to have a record made of their cases. The final citizenship rolls thereafter to be prepared must of necessity have been inaccurate and incomplete.

The only record of the examination of persons appearing before the Commission under the act of 1898 made by the Commission was such notations as it saw fit to enter upon a card which was known as a "field card." (See Commissioner Bixby's testimony, Senate Report No. 5013, pt. 1, 59th Cong., 2d sess., p. 499.) The Commission made up the final citizenship roll from these field cards with the limited notations made thereon.

Each case acted upon by the Commission was forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior for final approval. The field cards were not transmitted as a part of the record in the case, nor were the claimants or their attorneys permitted to inspect the field cards, although the Commission claimed that these cards were a part of the official records in the case. On page 501 of part 1 of Senate Report No. 5013, Mr. Bixby testified as follows:

"Q. Were those examination records the only records made by the Commission at that time?

"Commissioner BIXBY. No, sir; they made a card also in the freedmen's tent.

"Q. In the adjudication of cases before your Commission, do you consider that card as a portion of the evidence?

"Commissioner BIXBY. Yes, sir."

William O. Beall, an official of the Commission and in charge of the Choctaw and Chickasaw enrollment division at the time of the final rolls were being prepared testified, before W. D. Foulke, special inspector for the Department, on November 20, 1906, under oath, page 95, Senate Document No. 357, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, as follows:

"Q. Since you considered it your duty to notify the Department of every material record in a case, will you explain why a notice of the contents of the field cards or copies of the field cards were not sent up with the decision in cases?—A. Do you want my opinion, or as a matter of fact?

"Q. As a matter of fact.—A. As a matter of fact, it has never been the policy of the office to do that.

"Q. Of the Commission generally, or the Choctaw or Chickasaw division?—A. Never to my personal knowledge, since I have been employed here. I believe that these proceedings have been the first that ever a card has been taken out of the vaults to be made a part of the record in any proceedings.

"Q. Is it the first time that a copy has been made of the contents of a card?—A. Since the approval of the act of April, 1906, authorizing copies of records to be made, the Commissioner has made such copies. I don't believe, though, that any such copy of any card in any of the divisions was ever attached to and made a part of any enrollment record."

The tribal rolls prepared by the Indian officials, and which were exclusively used by the Commission in the preparation of the final citizenship rolls, were kept secret by the Commission, and no claimant or his or her attorney was permitted to inspect them to ascertain whether the name of the claimant appeared thereon, except in occasional cases where the Secretary remanded the cases to the Commission with instructions to take evidence and to permit an inspection of the record, and then the claimant was permitted at the hearing to inspect a particular roll which the claimant might designate.

At the hearing held at Muskogee, Okla., in November, 1906, before Special Inspector W. D. Foulke, on charges involving the official misconduct of an official of the Commission in the adjudication of the rights of the claimants, Mr. Bixby testified, under oath, as follows (Senate Doc. No. 357, 59th Cong., 2d sess., p. 58):

"Q. You stated that the tribal rolls submitted by the tribes or secured from the tribes were not open to inspection by persons for examination?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you mean by 'persons?'—A. I mean everybody or anybody.

"Q. Why was it you refused permission to counsel for applicants to inspect these rolls?—A. We never refused to produce the tribal enrollments on the trial of a case.

"Q. Wasn't an inspection of those rolls essential to the preparation of a petition, either for enrollment or for transfer?—A. Not in my judgment; that would be a question of opinion, I think.

"Q. You stated that neither the attorneys nor applicants were permitted to inspect those rolls?—A. Yes, sir."

Thus the census taken, based upon worthless, incomplete tribal records, which records were kept secretly by the Commission—no person having an interest in the tribal property being permitted to inspect them, and no person appearing before the Commission being subjected to such examination under oath, as appears from the records, as would enable either the Commission or the Secretary to correctly determine his status either as an Indian or a freedman, and no examination record being made of persons enumerated by the Commission as blood citizens—were the records upon which the determination of the rights of claimants, as well as all others, in the trust property of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, was based.

When the names of the claimants appeared on the tribal rolls the Commission would not insert either that fact or copy of the entry on the roll, in the record, or permit any objection of the claimant or his attorney to the action of the Commission to be made of record, as will appear from the testimony of W. O. Beall, an official of the Commission, in Senate Document No. 357, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, page 85, wherein he testified as follows:

"Q. Then I will go back to the proposition of a few moments ago, that if this was not a confirmed roll, and the country rolls were not confirmed rolls, and one had no greater effect than the other, why did you refuse to incorporate a statement of what one shows, and insist upon including in the record a statement of what the other shows?—A. The roll that is before us, known as the 1896 Choctaw census roll, was one of the rolls that were officially furnished the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes by the Choctaw tribal authorities of the census enumeration in 1896. As late as 1903 or 1904 the Commission secured from different persons—some, I think, were citizens of the Choctaw Nation, others were citizens of the United States—as far as they could, the various records and memoranda that were scattered throughout the country.

"Q. Didn't the act of Congress direct the Commission to secure and use all rolls and all information in possession of any of the citizens of the nation and officials of the nation, to be used in making the correct rolls of the nation?—A. I don't recollect that that is the language of the act, but it was practically that the Commission was authorized by Congress to procure and secure all these rolls. I will state, however, that there are undoubtedly a great many memorandums that are still outstanding that were made by people—Choctaw citizens engaged at various times in the preparation of these rolls—that the Commission has never secured, to which no importance has been attached, but simply memoranda made of them."

As a matter of fact, the Commission did not have the original rolls of the Choctaw community as it existed in 1830 and as prepared by the Government officers or of the Chickasaw community existing in 1837 as prepared by the Government officers and did not have any of the early rolls of members of the tribes, but merely such portions of the rolls of the tribes as had been prepared by the tribal authorities themselves during the preceding ten or fifteen years.

Even in cases where the names of claimants (who were of mixed Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood) herein appeared on the tribal rolls with the name of the full-blood Indian ancestor the Commission enrolled them as freedmen, which enrollment was approved by the Secretary of the Interior, as in the case of Oliver McCoy. On page 485 of part 1 of the Senate report appears a certified extract from the Choctaw census roll of 1885, showing the enrollment of Susan McCoy and her children by Oliver McCoy, a full-blood Indian, as citizens of the Choctaw Nation. On pages 486, 487, and 488 appear certified copies of the enrollment by the Commission and the approval of the enrollment by the Secretary of the Interior of the children and grandchildren of Oliver McCoy, a full-blood Choctaw, as freedmen of the Choctaw Nation. In this case the records of the nation themselves show that Oliver and Susan McCoy were legally intermarried; that she was his lawful wife, and that the children were the lawful issue of the marriage.

DENIAL OF CLAIMANTS OF THEIR PROPERTY BY COMMISSION ON GROUND THAT PROPER CONSIDERATION OF THEIR CASES WOULD INVOLVE TOO MUCH TROUBLE.

CLAIMANTS WERE DENIED THEIR PROPERTY RIGHTS BY THE COMMISSION, as shown by the official records, for the reason, assigned by the Commission, THAT THE PROPER CONSIDERATION OF THEIR CASES WOULD INVOLVE TOO MUCH WORK. The assignment of this reason by the Commission for its failure to properly consider the cases of claimants called forth the severe strictures contained in the opinion of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior in the case of Loula West and rendered under date of December 8, 1905, and reported in the Laws Affecting the Work of the Five Civilized Tribes, page 156:

"THE PLAINT OF THE COMMISSION SEEMS TO BE, IN SUBSTANCE, WHEN ANALYZED, THAT CONSIDERATION OF THE CASES OF PERSONS CLAIMING RIGHT OF CITIZENSHIP, RESIDENT IN THE NATION AND BORNE ON THE TRIBAL ROLLS, WILL INVOLVE SO MUCH LABOR AND BE SO INCONVENIENT THAT IT PREFERS THEY SHOULD NOT BE HEARD. * * *"

FINAL ROLLS, WHICH ARE BEING USED AS BASIS FOR DISTRIBUTION OF TRUST PROPERTY, SATURATED WITH FRAUD.

Not only are the final rolls made by the Commission, upon which it is proposed to distribute the trust property, notoriously inaccurate and incomplete, but they are saturated with actual and deliberate fraud perpetrated by administrative officers.

At the time the Commission was engaged in the work of preparing these final citizenship rolls there were attorneys representing the tribes, appointed by the Principal Chief of the Choctaw Nation and the Governor of the Chickasaw Nation. These attorneys were employed among other things to defeat the rights of certain persons to enrollment as citizens by blood of the tribes. During the month of June, 1903, an official of the Commission, William O. Beall by name, and who was chief clerk of the Choctaw and Chickasaw enrollment division (see paragraph 2 of his answer under oath, p. 18, Senate Doc. 357, 59th Cong., 2d sess.), was furloughed on the 5th day of June for the remainder of the month, owing to a shortage of funds with which to carry on the work of the Commission. On the 8th day of June he entered the office of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, attorneys for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, with the knowledge and consent of Clifton R. Breckenridge, a member of the Commission, and there assisted in the preparation of citizenship cases against claimants seeking enrollment as citizens of these tribes. (See paragraph 6, p. 18, Senate Doc. 357.)

On July 1, 1903, he returned to the Commission and resumed his position as chief clerk of the Choctaw and Chickasaw enrollment division. In this position he examined every case passed upon by the law division and instructed the law clerks in many cases upon questions of law, and in many instances directed them to rewrite their decisions, as appears from the testimony of D. C. Lloyd, former chief law clerk, but in 1906 one of the law clerks of the Choctaw and Chickasaw enrollment division. Mr. Lloyd (p. 33, Senate Doc. 357) testified as follows:

"Q. At any time since you have been writing decisions has Mr. Beall overruled any decisions or marked them for change in the law and evidence of the case?—A. I can explain that, I think. I have had charge of that division for some years until lately, and I was there to prepare decisions in all the cases. I would get a bunch of them prepared and bring them in, a basketful at a time, to Mr. Beall. Mr. Beall was the chief clerk of that division and everything had to go through his hands, and he was responsible for these decisions. After they got through my hands then he was responsible. If he didn't agree with me we had a pretty hot argument; sometimes he would convince me that I was wrong, and sometimes it was the other way. Then I would take the decisions back to my room and we would argue some more. Sometimes we would argue the same case fifteen or twenty times." (See also letter to Secretary, S. Doc. No. 357, p. 158.)

Mr. Wirt Franklin, formerly a law clerk of the Choctaw and Chickasaw division, testified under oath as follows before the select committee (p. 346, Senate Report 5013, part 1):

"Mr. BALLINGER. During the time you were with the Commission as attorney did Mr. Beall instruct you as to how you should write up decisions?

"Mr. FRANKLIN. Yes, sir.

"Mr. BALLINGER. Regardless of the law and the evidence?

"Mr. FRANKLIN. Well, I remember one instance which I consider was regardless of the law and the evidence; yes, sir.

"Mr. BALLINGER. State that case.

"Mr. FRANKLIN. It was at the time the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court was in session, and they had before that court the case of Molsey Butler, who was one of those applicants in the cases to which you have referred in your opening statement.

"At the time this decision was rendered by the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court there were a good many cases of a parallel nature that were yet to be decided by the Commission, and I had the reports of those cases on my desk, ready to prepare the decisions in the cases.

"The decision in the Molsey Butler case came out, and my recollection is that Mr. Beall came into the room, where I was sitting at the time at my desk, and laid this opinion of the citizenship court on my desk, with a statement to the effect: 'Here, Franklin, is this Molsey Butler opinion; deny all these niggers, following this opinion.'

"Mr. BALLINGER. Did he say anything to you about denial regardless of the records?

"Mr. FRANKLIN. The statement was, 'Deny all those niggers following the Molsey Butler case,' or words to that effect. I can not be certain of the exact words.

"Mr. BALLINGER. Did you write up any decisions afterwards, submit them to Mr. Beall thereafter, and did he reject them?

"Mr. FRANKLIN. I have written a great many decisions which he has sent back with notice on them how to re-form them."

See also testimony of Charles Von Weise (p. 355, Senate Report 5013, part 1).

From the memorandum slips attached to these opinions and in the handwriting of Mr. Beall we find his instructions, one of them being as follows (p. 5, Foulke Report, Senate Document No. 357):

"Think decision should recite that applicant is the illegitimate child of an intermarried white citizen; that under act of April 26, 1906, she must take the status of the mother and should be refused under act of June 21, 1906."

Here we find a man who was not a lawyer, but a layman, directing law clerks how to prepare legal opinions in the cases of claimants. On page 89 of Senate Document No. 357 Mr. Beall testified as follows:

"Q. Mr. Beall, have you ever been admitted to practice law before any court or commission?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You are a graduate of a law school, are you not?—A. No, sir."

In cases where applications had been made to the Commission by this class of persons as required by law, those applications were not forwarded as a part of the record submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, notwithstanding the fact that the existence of the application was known to Mr. Beall and other employees of the Commission, and the case was decided adversely to the applicant by the Secretary on the sole ground that the record did not disclose an application, as will appear on pages 5, 6, and 7 of the Foulke Report, Senate Document No. 357, to which document attention is directed.

In other cases applications were taken, either deliberately or by criminal carelessness, from the records of the Commission, as appears from the mutilated portions of the record remaining. In some of these cases we find a demurrer filed to an application, the demurrer in existence, the application gone, and the Department holding that although these people are admittedly of Indian blood, that they could not be enrolled because the application was not in existence. (Senate Report No. 5013, pt. 2, p. 361.)

On July 4, 1904, William C. Beall was promoted to the position of secretary to the Commission. (See paragraph 10 of his verified answer on page 19 of Senate Doc. No. 357, 59th Cong., 2d sess.) Although he was no longer directly connected with the Choctaw and Chickasaw division, every decision prepared by the law clerks of that division continued to go to Mr. Beall for his approval before going to the Commissioner, although the decisions from neither the Cherokee, Creek, nor Seminole division went to him for his approval. On page 93 of Senate Document No. 357, Mr. Beall testified as follows:

"Q. Then you are not now nominally in charge of the Choctaw and Chickasaw division?—A. No; I am not. I have no official designation.

"Q. Why is it that Mr. Johnson, as he so testified, still brings the decisions of that division to your desk and those decisions pass through you before they go to the chief law clerk, when they don't in any other division?—A. It is a matter of precedent.

"By Mr. FOULKE:

"Q. You do that still?—A. Yes; I still do it."

We next find William O. Beall, formerly employed by Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish to prepare cases against applicants for enrollment, presiding at hearings had before the Commission in the cases of claimants and quoting provisions of bills pending in Congress and determining their rights thereunder. On page 88 of Senate Document No. 357 Mr. Beall testified under oath as follows with reference to the hearings had in the cases of claimants:

"Q. Now, Mr. Beall, I want to ask you if you have at any time in the hearing of any cases ever quoted a provision from a bill pending in Congress which had not become a law for the purpose of determining the rights of the applicants?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Can you state in what case?—A. I couldn't now. In a great number of cases."

William O. Beall, while secretary to the Commission, openly asserted that claimants should not be enrolled if there was any possible way to prevent their enrollment as citizens of the nations. Upon this point Charles Von Weise (Senate Report No. 5013, pt. 1, p. 357) testified as follows:

"Mr. BALLINGER. State to the committee as briefly as you can the conversation you had with Mr. Beall, if you had any, relative to the enrollment of this class of transfer cases at Ardmore more than a year ago.

"Mr. VON WEISE. I think it was along in the fall some time. I can not recall the date of it, but Mr. Beall was down on Commission business at Ardmore, and the conversation came up as to those freedmen transfer cases, and he remarked to me that there was not any need of my wasting my time and money on those cases. I had filed then quite a number of petitions for transfer. They were going to be denied, he said, if there was any power to do it; that this next session of Congress would have a request made to it to eliminate that class of people from ever being enrolled on the blood rolls, because, he stated, they were the descendants of slaves, and the slaves were mere chattels, and he went on giving his reasons. That is the only conversation I ever had with him there, and he has reiterated that here in Muskogee in the presence of Mr. Tom Norman, attorney at Ardmore.

"The CHAIRMAN. Were you present at that time?

"Mr. VON WEISE. Yes, sir; reiterated to me, I mean, in the presence of Mr. Norman, that the decisions of the Attorney-General in those cases, and in two or three other cases where the Department has overruled the Commission, were absolutely nonsensical; that they were not based upon law or common sense, and especially in these transfer cases; that if there was any power to get around following that, it would be done. Mr. Norman is an attorney and does not represent any freedmen's cases."

On page 96, Senate Document No. 357, upon this point, Beall testified as follows:

"Q. Did you not on that date tell me, when I suggested the reason for wanting to see those records, that these people would never be enrolled as citizens by blood?—A. I don't remember of any such statement. I may have thought so at the time.

"Q. May you not have said that at that time?—A. Not to you.

"Q. Did you to anyone?—A. I may have expressed such an opinion to some employee here in the office; that was my honest conviction that they were not going to be enrolled."

We next find this man Beall deceiving attorneys for claimants by informing them that the records did not disclose the existence of applications, when, as a matter of fact, the records did disclose the existence of the applications, as in the case of Prince Butler, which appears on page 385, part 1, of Senate Report No. 5013; also in the case of Bettie Ligon, a citizen by blood of the Chickasaw Nation. On July 3, 1905, the Commissioner wrote Albert J. Lee, attorney for Bettie Ligon, in part as follows:

"In reply to your letter, you are advised that it does not appear from the records of this office that application has been made to the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes for the enrollment of Bettie Ligon as a citizen by blood of the Choctaw or Chickasaw Nation."

On June 9, 1906, the Commissioner rendered an opinion which appears on pages 489 and 490 of Senate Report 5013, part 1, in which opinion the Commissioner says:

"The records of this office show that on September 9, 1896, original application was made to the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes for the enrollment of Bettie Ligon, etc., as citizens of the Chickasaw Nation."

If these were the only cases in which these errors occurred, the moral turpitude of this official would not be so censurable, but dozens of similar cases appear of record, and doubtless thousands more exist.

In order to prevent claimants or their attorneys from ascertaining what the records disclosed in these cases, Commissioner Bixby and Secretary Beall at first refused attorneys permission to inspect the records. It was not until the Secretary of the Interior directed them, as appears from the correspondence on pages 373, 374, 375, and 376 of the Senate report, to accord this right to the claimants herein that attorneys for claimants were permitted to inspect the records, and the inspection of the records under departmental orders disclosed false statements contained in the letters prepared by William O. Beall and signed by the Commissioner and the decisions of these cases prepared by William O. Beall and approved by the Commissioner.

In the absence of the Commissioner, Beall was acting Commissioner, and as such directed the business of the office. On page 513 of Senate Report No. 5013, part 1, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, Mr. Bixby testified as follows with reference to Beall: "I can't tell you; in a general way he runs the office."

Thus we find this man Beall, while constructively in the employ of the Commission, actually in the employ of the attorneys for these nations, assisting in the preparation of cases to defeat the rights of persons entitled to enrollment as citizens of the nations. (See Senate Doc. 357, p. 13, 59th Cong., 2d sess.)

We then find him the following month back at work with the Commission, but at all times loyal to his former employers, ever ready to do their bidding; suppressing applications in cases so as to defeat the rights of persons to enrollment as citizens of the tribes; sending false and misleading statements to their attorneys, and embodying false statements in the decisions, later pro forma approved by the Commissioner; seeking to prevent attorneys for claimants from inspecting the record in their cases, in order that his false statements might not be discovered; instructing law clerks to decide cases against claimants, quoting at hearings in these cases provisions of bills pending in Congress and determining the rights of claimants herein thereunder; announcing months in advance with remarkable accuracy that Congress would enact a law excluding claimants from enrollment as citizens of the tribes; assisting later in the preparation of a draft of a bill to be introduced in Congress to defeat the rights of claimants; informing attorneys employed by claimants to represent them that they were wasting their time, as claimants would not be enrolled if there was any way by which the Commission could prevent it.

It appears from the testimony of the member of the Commission who gave Mr. Beall authority to accept employment from this firm of attorneys that the Commission considered the duties of the attorneys for the nations and the duties of the Commission practically identical—one charged by law to see that every person entitled to enrollment as a member of the tribes was enrolled, the other employed by the nations to defeat the rights of persons whom the officials of those tribes did not believe were entitled to enrollment. Yet the duties of the Commission and the attorneys, in the language of Clifton R. Breckenridge, a member of the Commission, were practically identical. In explaining why he gave his consent to Beall's employment by Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, he said (p. 21, Senate Doc. 357, 59th Cong., 2d sess.):

"A. I considered it proper because, in the first place, the labors of the Commission and the labors of the counsel for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations were practically identical in character."

These decisions, thus prepared under the direction of Beall, went to Commissioner Bixby for his approval. On page 504 of part 1, Senate Report 5013, Mr. Bixby testified under oath as follows:

"Commissioner BIXBY. Yes; I finally decided, always. The Acting Commissioner never decided a case, to my knowledge.

"Mr. BALLINGER. Did you examine the records in these cases——

"Mr. ROGERS. I object to that question. Mr. Bixby signs these decisions, and they are his decisions.

"The CHAIRMAN. He may ask the question.

"Commissioner BIXBY. I attempt to. Of course, it is a pretty big task. I sit up nights trying to do it and work practically sixteen to eighteen hours a day trying to do it, but of course I depend largely on my legal department. I do not claim to be a lawyer, of course, but I do the best I can.

"Mr. BALLINGER. Do you intend that the committee shall understand that in all citizenship cases decided by your Commission and over your name you have examined the records in those cases?

"Commissioner BIXBY. No, sir; I do not pretend that I have examined every part of the record. In some cases I do. I have read a great many cases, every word of them, but I do not read all the testimony in every case. I admit that. It would be an absolute physical impossibility."

But few, if any, decisions in the class of cases of claimants of mixed Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian and negro blood were handed down by the Commissioner under the departmental decisions in the test case of Joe and Dillard Perry, rendered December 8, 1905, and reported in the Laws Affecting the Work of the Five Civilized Tribes, page 158, by which decision the Assistant Attorney-General directed the enrollment of all persons of mixed Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian and negro blood, all decisions being held back until after the passage of the Five Civilized Tribes bill, which contained a provision inserted, as Mr. Bixby testifies (Senate Rept. No. 5013, pt. 1, 59th Cong., 2d sess., p. 503) at his instigation, and was prepared by Beall, which was as follows:

SECTION 4 OF THE ACT APPROVED APRIL 26, 1906.

"That no name shall be transferred from the approved freedmen, or any other approved rolls of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes, respectively, to the roll of citizens by blood unless the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes show that application for enrollment as a citizen by blood was made within the time prescribed by law by or for the party seeking the transfer, and said records shall be conclusive evidence as to the fact of such application, unless it be shown by documentary evidence that the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes actually received such application within the time prescribed by law.

(The last provision, relating to documentary evidence, was inserted by the Senate Indian Committee at the instance of counsel for claimants, who protested to the committee against the enactment of this legislation.)

Thus fulfilling the prediction made by William O. Beall to Charles Von Weise and others, and as appears from the testimony of Commissioner Bixby on page 503 of part 1 of Senate Report No. 5013, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, wherein Mr. Bixby, under oath, testified as follows:

"Mr. BALLINGER. Did you decide a single case between November 11, 1905, and the date of the approval of the Five Civilized Tribes bill?

"Commissioner BIXBY. I did not have time."

SECRETARY GAVE NO CONSIDERATION TO CASES ON REVIEW.

The great majority of these decisions did not reach the Department until during the months of October, November, and December. The action theretofore taken on them by the Commission was merely clerical. The official action to be taken thereon was by the Secretary of the Interior, for, by a provision of the Indian appropriation bill approved March 3, 1905, all the work of the Commission, and the powers theretofore exercised by the Commission, were conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior after the 1st day of July, 1905.

Did the Secretary of the Interior consider these cases so as to intelligently pass upon them and see that the rolls were made as provided by law? In an official communication to the United States Senate, under date of March 4, 1907, and printed as Senate Document No. 390, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, Acting Secretary of the Interior Thomas Ryan says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 4, 1907.

SIR: In further response to the Senate resolution dated February 28, 1907, relative to the number of Indians and freedmen enrollment cases pending before the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes on February 25, 1907, also in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on review and before the Department, I have the honor to advise you that since my report of the 2d instant the Department has received, on March 2, 168 cases; March 4, 141 cases, making a total of 501 cases, aggregating 1,549 cases received by the Secretary since February 25, 1907, and making a total of 2,023 cases for examination and decision after February 25 and on or before March 4, 1907.

Respectfully,

THOS. RYAN, Acting Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Here we find the Secretary of the Interior, in seven days, passing upon 2,023 cases, which involved the rights of 10,000 persons. The records in a majority of these cases were voluminous. They were not even examined by the Secretary, or by any official of his Department. No pretense was made of examination. Employees of the Department took the cases and dictated a mere statement affirming the decision of the Commission, and the decisions were then stamped by messengers with rubber stamps "affirmed."

In cases where claimants had duly and regularly filed written applications, and the applications were on file with the Commission, the petitions for the transfer of the names of certain of the claimants herein were denied by the Commission and the Secretary, notwithstanding the proof of their Indian blood and descent was conclusively shown by the record in the case. This can not be denied by either the attorneys for the Government or for the nations. It is conclusively shown by Senate Report No. 5013, part 2, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, in the case of Bettie Ligon and her children; also in the case of Prince Butler, and likewise in the case of Callie Newberry.

But section 4 of the act approved April 26, 1906, did not prevent the correct enrollment of certain claimants herein who had complied with the terms and provisions of the laws under which they were before the Commission, had it been correctly construed.

PROPER CONSTRUCTION OF SECTION 4.

The first act of Congress authorizing the Commission to prepare "rolls of citizenship" of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes was the act of June 10, 1896. That act required every person applying for enrollment to submit an application, in which he was required to assert his claim as a citizen or as a freedman. The act of May 31, 1900, likewise required the submission of an application, as did also the act of July 1, 1902. But the act of June 28, 1898, under which the great majority of claimants were before the Commission, did not authorize or require them to assert a right to any particular kind of enrollment. Claimants were directed to appear before the Commission, at such times and places as the Commission might direct, for examination by the Commission, and, after such examination, the duty devolved wholly upon the Commission of correctly enrolling them in accordance with the terms and provisions of the statute, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The statute prescribed the qualifications for enrollment as citizens to be:

1. A right under existing law, which was a right under the treaties of 1830 with the Choctaws and 1837 with the Chickasaws.

2. That he or she be of Choctaw or Chickasaw blood, and resident of the nation, which latter provision was void, as heretofore pointed out.

Thus the appearance of claimants before the Commission under the act of 1898 operated as an application for enrollment as citizens of blood, provided only they were of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood, or were otherwise entitled under the treaties and laws of the United States to participate in the distribution of the property.

In construing this section we must look to previous enactments and ascertain the intention of Congress with reference to the enrollment of claimants. It must be presumed that Congress in ratifying the agreements and enacting the laws referred to knew of the nature of appellants' title, and that it did not intend to interfere therewith, even though it possessed the power, which it did not. In the case of United States v. Heth (3 Cranch, p. 409, 2 L. ed., p. 482) the court said:

"Where it can be shown that the Government has once adopted a certain rule of justice for its conduct, it is fair to infer that in legislating afterwards upon the same subject it intended to pursue the same rule, unless the contrary shall be clearly expressed."

In the case of United States v. Central Pacific Railroad Company (118 U. S., p. 241, 30 L. ed., p. 175) the court said:

"There is another view in this controversy which seems to us conclusive. As the contract between the United States and the railroad company contained in the acts of July 1, 1852, and of July 2, 1864, has been interpreted by this court to authorize the retention by the Government of compensation for services only on those roads which the United States aided in building, the CONSTRUCTION which the appellant seeks to put on the second section of the act of May 8, 1878, WOULD NOT ONLY RENDER THAT SECTION A BREACH OF FAITH ON THE PART OF THE UNITED STATES, BUT AN INVASION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE APPELLEE. WE ARE BOUND, IF POSSIBLE, SO TO CONSTRUE THE LAW AS TO LAY IT OPEN TO NEITHER OF THESE OBJECTIONS. (Broughton v. Pensacola, 93 U. S., 266, 23 L. ed., 896; Red Rock v. Henry, 106 U. S., 596, 27 L. ed., 251; Hobbs v. McLean, 29 L. ed., 940, decided at the present term and cases were cited; United States v. Cooms, 12 Pet., 72; 37 U. S., bk. 9, L. ed., 1004.) THE CONSTRUCTION CONTENDED FOR BY THE APPELLEE PRESERVES THE GOOD FAITH OF THE GOVERNMENT AND FREES THE ACT FROM THE IMPUTATION OF IMPAIRING RIGHTS SECURED BY THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES."

MERE APPEARANCE OF PERSON BEFORE COMMISSION UNDER ACT OF 1898 OPERATED AS APPLICATION FOR ENROLLMENT AS BLOOD CITIZEN, PROVIDED ONLY HE OR SHE WAS OF INDIAN BLOOD.

Did not Congress intend that the appearance of all persons before the Commission in 1898 should operate as an application for their correct enrollment either as blood citizens or as freedmen? Such was unquestionably the intention of Congress when it enacted the law of 1898, and the appearance of the person before the Commission under that law must necessarily be construed as an application for correct enrollment under section 4 of the act approved April 26, 1906. If Congress did not intend that the appearance of a person before the Commission under the act of 1898 should operate as an application for such enrollment as the person thus appearing was entitled to, then every person who appeared before the Commission under the act of 1898, although he be a full-blood Indian, was barred from enrollment as a citizen by blood, for, by section 34 of the supplemental agreement, approved July 1, 1902, it was provided that "the application of no person whomsoever for enrollment shall be received after the expiration" of ninety days after the ratification of this agreement. The agreement was ratified on September 25, 1902, and the ninety-day limit expired on December 24, 1902. As no person who was before the Commission under the act of 1898 subsequently made an application to the Commission, under a law requiring the submission of an application for enrollment as a citizen, they would all be barred under that act from enrollment, if it should be held that their mere appearance under the act of 1898 before the Commission did not operate as an application for their correct enrollment.

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR AND COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS EQUALLY RESPONSIBLE.

As a result of this confusion of statutory enactments opinions were rendered by the Indian Territory division of the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and approved by the Secretary; by the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and approved by the Commissioner and by the Secretary of the Interior, which, if it were not for the frightful consequences resulting from those decisions in the denial to persons of their property rights in this trust property, would have been grotesque. Every technicality and subterfuge known to the officers of this Department was employed by the offices of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, to defeat claimants of their legal property rights. As an illustration:

The Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior, whose office has been the one haven of refuge for claimants, and who have uniformly secured a reasonable adjudication of their rights when the Secretary of the Interior was gracious enough to permit them to have their cases referred to that office for a legal opinion, rendered a line of legal opinions, which were approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and thereby became the laws of the Department in the adjudication of the cases of claimants. These laws left no room to the administrative officers to deny the rights of claimants in thousands of cases where they were subsequently denied. In order to circumvent these decisions an opinion was prepared by an employee of the legal department of the Indian Office, who was insane at the time he wrote the opinion, and who was, within a few days thereafter, adjudged by the supreme court of the District of Columbia to be insane, and by its decree incarcerated in St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum across the river, and who subsequently died in the insane asylum. This decision, prepared by this lunatic, was written in a case arising from the Cherokee Nation, where different laws governed the enrollment of applicants. This lunatic decided questions not in the records of that case and not before the Department for determination. This decision, rendered by this lunatic, was pro forma affirmed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and thereafter pro forma affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior. Immediately upon the affirmation of this decision by the Secretary the officers of the Indian Territory division of the Secretary's Office, the officers of the Indian Bureau, and the officers of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes seized upon this decision in order to circumvent the decisions rendered by the legal department. In practically every decision, denying the rights of claimants rendered by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior, from that day until the jurisdiction of all these officers ceased and terminated on the 4th day of March, 1907, by operation of law, the decision of this lunatic was invoked and referred to in the decision rendered in the case as "Departmental letter of May 25, 1906, I. T. D., 9114–1906."

This decision was written by a lunatic and initialed by him; his initials appearing upon the original decision as M. M. M., and if any person desires to inform himself as to the accuracy of this statement he can easily ascertain who Mr. M. M. M. was by examining the records of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the records of St. Elizabeth's Insane Asylum; and the decisions rendered in all these cases in which reference is made to the above initials and above decision rendered May 25, 1906.

This decision rendered in the case of a Cherokee claimant, where different laws governed the adjudication of rights, was rigidly adhered to in the adjudication of cases of claimants who asserted their rights to share in the common trust property of the Choctaws and Chickasaws. Counsel for claimants submit that this smacked of criminality, PARTICULARLY AS THE DEPARTMENT CONTINUED TO ADJUDICATE CASES UNDER THIS DECISION AFTER THE TRUE FACTS BECAME KNOWN TO THE OFFICERS OF THAT DEPARTMENT.

Nor can the office of the Secretary of the Interior nor office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shift the responsibility of the failure to correctly enroll claimants upon the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs had in his office the official rolls prepared by officers of the United States of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians from 1830 to 1860. These rolls were authentic and reliable rolls and contained the names of practically every one of the claimants or the names of their ancestors.

Under the act of Congress of 1898, as construed and defined by Assistant Attorney-General Willis J. Van Devanter in his opinion rendered under date of March 17, 1899, and approved by the Secretary on March 17, 1899, and under the act approved July 1, 1902, every person whose name rightfully appeared upon any tribal roll of any tribe, together with his or her descendants, was entitled to enrollment. Neither the Indian Office nor the Secretary's office pretended to examine the official rolls locked up in a room in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to ascertain whether names of claimants, whose rights they were denying, appeared upon those rolls, or whether the names of their ancestors appeared upon any of those rolls. Nor did these officers of the Government call upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the fifty or seventy-five official rolls of these people which were in his Department, and examine those rolls to see whether or not the names of claimants, or their ancestors, appeared thereon. It has only been within the last three weeks that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has had sorted out, and put together, the official rolls of these people, WHICH HAVE BEEN LYING IN A ROOM IN HIS BUREAU SINCE THE YEAR 1844.

Notwithstanding these facts are well known to these officers, which alone prove conclusively that the final rolls of these people as made by the Department are not correct, the officers of this Department are inflexibly and implacably opposing any legislation that will give to rightful claimants their property and are likewise opposing the enactment of any legislation that will strike from the rolls, saturated with fraud as they are, the names of thousands of persons who have no legal right thereon. AND ALL THIS IS BEING DONE IN THE NAME OF THE MIGHTY GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND IN THE SO-CALLED CAUSE OF JUSTICE.

CLAIMANTS DEPRIVED OF THEIR RIGHTS THROUGH BRIBERY OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS.

Probably the most glaring frauds perpetrated on any class of claimants by administrative officers occurred in the jurisdiction of the claims of that class of claimants known to the Department as "court-judgment citizens." The act of June 10, 1896, provided that if either the claimant or the Indian governments were aggrieved at the decision of the Commission in the case of any claimant to enrollment as a member of the Choctaw or Chickasaw tribes an appeal could be taken to the United States district courts in Indian Territory. The act prescribed the manner in which appeal should be taken. Appeals were taken from the decisions of the Commission to the United States district courts in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in cases involving the rights of more than 5,000 claimants.

Judgments were rendered, after full hearings and after claimants and witnesses had been examined and cross-examined by counsel in open court, decreeing more than 4,000 of these claimants to be citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. The decrees were duly certified to the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes. An appeal was subsequently taken to the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Stephens v. Cherokee Nation (174 U. S., 488; 43 L. ed., 1056), which court held the act to be constitutional and the judgments to be final.

Thereafter it was alleged by the nations that many persons had been enrolled by judgments of the United States district courts, which judgments had been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the test case of Stephens v. Cherokee Nation (174 U. S., p. 488) who were not entitled to enrollment, and that the United States district courts and the Supreme Court of the United States had erred in their holdings of law and that the district courts did not possess the power to try the cases de novo, but that their jurisdiction extended only to a review of the action of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes. Accordingly, Congress inserted in the supplemental agreement with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. L., 641), a provision creating a legislative commission, consisting of three members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, and which commission was designated in the agreement as the "Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court." It was provided that the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, acting jointly or separately, could, within ninety days after the approval of the agreement, file a petition in equity in the Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court, citing ten representative persons, admitted to citizenship by the United States district courts, to appear before that court and show cause why the judgments of the United States district courts and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States rendered in their cases should not be annulled.

It was expressly provided that the jurisdiction of this unique legislative commission, known as the "Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court," should be confined exclusively to two questions:

1. Did the United States courts in the Indian Territory, acting under the act of Congress approved June 10, 1896, admit persons to citizenship, and to enrollment as such citizens, in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, without notice of the proceedings in such courts being given to each of said nations?

2. Whether the proceedings in the United States courts in Indian Territory, under the act of June 10, 1896, should have been confined to a review of the action of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes upon the papers and evidence submitted to such Commission and should not have extended to trial de novo of the question of citizenship.

It was further provided that if this legislative Commission held the judgments of the district courts to be void on either of these grounds, said decree should operate to vacate and annul all judgments procured in the United States district courts.

This legislative Commission rendered an opinion holding the judgments of the United States district courts, which judgments had been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, void upon the two grounds:

1. That proper notice of proceedings in the district courts had not been served upon both the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

2. That said United States district courts should have been confined to merely a review of the action of the Commission and should not have extended to trial de novo.

Thus every judgment rendered by the United States district courts after a full, free, and impartial hearing, and which judgments were affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, were vacated and annulled.

The act then provided:

"In the event said citizenship judgments or decisions are annulled or vacated in the test suit hereinbefore authorized, because of either or both of the irregularities claimed and insisted upon by said nations as aforesaid, then the files, papers, and proceedings in any citizenship case in which the judgment or decision is so annulled or vacated, shall, upon written application therefor, made within ninety days thereafter by any party thereto, who is thus deprived of a favorable judgment upon his claimed citizenship, to be transferred and certified to said citizenship court by the court having custody and control of such files, papers, and proceedings, and, upon the filing in such citizenship court of files, papers, and proceedings in any such citizenship case, accompanied by due proof that notice in writing of the transfer and certification thereof had been given to the chief executive officer of each of said nations, said citizenship case shall be docketed in said citizenship court, and such further proceedings shall be had therein in that court as ought to have been had in the court to which the same was taken on appeal from the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, and as if no judgment or decision had been rendered therein."

This legislative court proceeded to determine the rights of all these claimants, and by decree entered in the month of December, 1905, struck down practically every claimant whose case had gone before that LEGISLATIVE COURT, thus reversing practically all the judgments entered by the United States district courts and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in these cases.

The great majority of persons thus deprived of their rights were admittedly of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood and descent, and had A VESTED RIGHT IN THE TRIBAL PROPERTY UNDER THE TREATY OF 1830 AND THE GRANT MADE TO THE CHOCTAW NATION IN 1842, IN TRUST FOR THOSE PERSONS WHO COMPRISES THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY IN 1830 AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

As a reward for the superior legal services rendered in these cases, this famous legislative commission awarded a fee of $750,000 which was paid to the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, attorneys at law, of McAlester, Ind. T., out of the TRUST FUNDS OF THE CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS, AND IN WHICH FUNDS THE PERSONS THUS DISPOSSESSED OF THEIR PROPERTY HAD A VESTED RIGHT UNDER THE TREATIES.

It is alleged that the members of that court were bribed and received as a consideration for their decisions a part of the fee paid these attorneys. Counsel for claimants are reliably informed that the Secretary of the Interior NOW HAS IN HIS POSSESSION POSITIVE PROOF OF THE BRIBERY OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THAT COURT, SAID PROOF SETTING FORTH THE AMOUNT PAID CERTAIN MEMBERS OF THAT COURT, THE TIME AND PLACE THE PAYMENTS WERE MADE, AND THE MANNER OF THE PAYMENTS. This evidence has been in the possession of the Secretary of the Interior for more than three months and yet no investigation, so far as counsel for claimants have been able to ascertain, HAS BEEN INAUGURATED AND NO PROCEEDINGS HAVE BEEN INSTITUTED CALCULATED TO BRING THESE GUILTY PERSONS BEFORE THE BAR OF JUSTICE, ALTHOUGH THE TIME IN WHICH THEY CAN BE CRIMINALLY PROSECUTED IS RAPIDLY EXPIRING.

The members of this firm of attorneys, George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish, were, on the 2d day of November, 1902, indicted by a Federal grand jury, sitting at the city of Ardmore, Ind. T., for the crime of conspiracy to defraud the Chickasaw Nation out of the sum of $28,876.90, certified copy of which indictment is hereto attached.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Indian Territory, Southern District, ss:

In the United States court for the southern district of the Indian Teritory, sitting at Ardmore, for the May term, 1905. United States v. D. H. Johnston, P. S. Mosely, George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish, defendants. Indictment for conspiracy.

The grand jurors of the United States of America, duly selected, summoned, impaneled, sworn, and charged to inquire within and for the body of the southern district of the Indian Territory, in the name and by the authority of the United States of America, upon their oaths do find, present, and charge, that one D. H. Johnston, one P. S. Mosely, one George Mansfield, one J. F. McMurray, and one Melvin Cornish, and others to the grand jury unknown, on the 2d day of November, A. D. 1902, within the southern district of the Indian Territory did unlawfully and feloniously commit the crime of conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States by defrauding the Chickasaw Nation, committed as follows:

That during all these times herein mentioned the said P. S. Mosely was governor of the Chickasaw Nation, except from September, 1904, when the said D. H. Johnston was governor of the Chickasaw Nation, and during all of these times the said George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish were each citizens of the United States and not members of any Indian tribe or nation, and were associated together as a firm of attorneys under the name and style of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish.

That the said Chickasaw Nation was at all times herein mentioned composed of the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, and duly authorized and recognized by the laws of the United States as a political dependency and government, under the name of the Chickasaw Nation, having a governor, auditor public accounts, national treasurer, and legislature. That to the said Chickasaw Nation there belonged in the Treasury of the United States large sums of money known as trust and invested funds, coal and asphaltum royalty funds, and funds derived from the sale of lots in town sites.

That at the time and place aforesaid, and at all times herein mentioned, the said D. H. Johnston, P. S. Mosely, George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish, and others to the grand jury unknown, did falsely, feloniously, unlawfully and wickedly conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together among themselves to defraud the Chickasaw Nation out of large and divers sums of money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the said Chickasaw Nation.

That in pursuance to and to effect the object of said conspiracy, combination, confederacy, and agreement, said P. S. Mosely, as governor of the Chickasaw Nation, caused the auditor public accounts, without authority of law, to issue at divers times certain warrants upon the national treasurer of the Chickasaw Nation, payable to said Mansfield, McMurray, and Cornish, at such times and in amounts as follows:

No.	Date.	Amount.
801	November 2, 1902	$2,700.00
802	November 26, 1902	2,500.00
803	November 8, 1902	2,500.00
804	November 12, 1902	1,000.00
805	November 12, 1902	250.00
806	November 12, 1902	100.00
807	November 12, 1902	515.00
943	April 16, 1903	396.05
944	April 16, 1903	1,628.75
945	April 16, 1903	385.75
1475	February 3, 1904	2,000.00
1477	February 3, 1904	1,333.00
1478	February 3, 1904	1,667.00
1479	February 3, 1904	1,641.95
1480	February 3, 1904	1,000.00
1485	February 3, 1904	2,700.00
2235	July 28, 1904	3,879.45
	Total	28,876.90

That in pursuance to and to effect the object of said conspiracy, combination, confederacy, and agreement, said D. H. Johnston on the 14th day of February, 1905, within the district and territory aforesaid, without authority of law, caused the auditor public accounts to issue a certain warrant upon the national treasurer of the Chickasaw Nation, payable to the said Mansfield, McMurray, and Cornish, numbered 112, for the sum of $2,500.

That each of said warrants hereinbefore named were issued upon a false, fictitious, and pretended claim that the amounts therein named were for actual expenses of the said Mansfield, McMurray, and Cornish while engaged as attorneys for the Chickasaw Nation.

That in pursuance of and to effect the object of said conspiracy, combination, confederacy, and agrement, said D. H. Johnston, P. S. Mosely, George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish, and each of them did present said false and fraudulent warrants, well knowing that they were false and fraudulent, to the national treasurer of the Chickasaw Nation, and caused the same to be paid by the said national treasurer out of the trust funds of the said Chickasaw Nation then in the subtreasury of the United States at St. Louis, Mo.; that at the time such moneys were paid said D. H. Johnston, P. S. Mosely, George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish, and each of them well knew they were not lawfully entitled to said money, and well knew that said items of expenses were fictitious and fraudulent, and well knew that no itemized statement of expenses, as required by law, was ever presented, allowed or approved, and well knew that said money was obtained without consideration and without any authority of law, but falsely, fraudulently, feloniously, unlawfully and wickedly did then and thereby contrive and intend to cheat and defraud the Chickasaw Nation out of said moneys, to wit, the sum of $31,376.90; and did then and thereby cheat and defraud the said Chickasaw Nation out of the moneys aforesaid; and did embezzle and convert to their own use the aforesaid moneys, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the United States of America.

W. B. JOHNSON,
United States Attorney.

INDIAN TERRITORY, Southern District.

I, C. M. Campbell, clerk of the United States court for the southern district, Indian Territory, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and perfect copy of the indictment in said cause as same appears of record in my office at Ardmore.

In testimony whereof witness my hand and seal of office this 25th day of October, 1905.

[SEAL.]

C. M. CAMPBELL, Clerk.
By W. S. CROCKETT, Deputy.

When this indictment was returned, the United States marshal for the southern district of the Indian Territory wired to the Department of Justice requesting that some of the accused persons, who were then in Washington, D. C., be taken into custody. That night men high in official position interceded with the Department of Justice and stopped the apprehension of these men in the ordinary course of legal procedure. They were not arrested, although for forty-eight hours they were shadowed by detectives who occupied adjoining rooms to them in the hotels of this city. They were permitted by the Department of Justice, at their own pleasure, to appear before the United States district court at Ardmore, Ind T., and give bond for their appearance at such time as the court might thereafter require. That was their first and last appearance before a court in connection with this proceeding. WHY THE INTERPOSITION OF POWERFUL INFLUENCE TO PROTECT THESE MEN FROM THE PROCESS OF LAW? WHY THIS EXTRAORDINARY EXTENSION OF COURTESY BY THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE?

INDICTMENT DISMISSED BY ORDER OF ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES.

Notwithstanding that this indictment was returned more than five years ago, these defendants were never tried, and because a United States district attorney, W. B. Johnson by name, refused to comply with the instructions of the Attorney-General of the United States and dismiss this indictment against these men he was summarily removed from office, and on the 15th day of November, 1907, by order of the Attorney-General of the United States, these cases were dismissed in order to prevent them from passing to the State courts, where these persons would have been tried and punished.

Since the first attempt on the part of the Attorney-General of the United States to compel the legal officer of his Department—charged by law with the duty of enforcing the laws of the United States in the southern district of the Indian Territory—to dismiss this indictment, and thereby effectually preclude the possibility of these men being punished, the finger of suspicion has irresistibly pointed to that Department of the Government. It is likewise pointing strongly to the men in public life who have made meteoric pilgrimages to the Department and importuned high Federal officers to direct the dismissal of this indictment. IS IT CONCEIVABLE THAT ANY OF THESE OFFICERS OF THE DEPARTMENT SECURED A PORTION OF THIS GREAT FEE OF $750,000 FOR THEIR SERVICES IN SHIELDING AND PROTECTING THESE MEN?

It is unnecessary to argue here the question of the guilt or innocence of these men. It is sufficient to say that if they had been innocent of the crime charged they would have exhausted every remedy within their power to have secured an early and speedy trial before a jury composed of their peers and neighbors.

This blot upon the integrity of high Federal officials can not be wiped out by any mere assertion that the indictments were not well founded, or that there was not sufficient proof to sustain the indictments. THESE WERE QUESTIONS FOR A COURT AND A JURY TO DETERMINE AND NOT FOR THE OFFICERS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Somewhere behind the scenes and in the dark recesses of the Federal mechanism there was a conspiracy concocted to protect these men, and that conspiracy, concocted in the dark, was carried through to successful fruition by departmental agency and secrecy.

And why the dismissal of these indictments on the last day of the existence of the Territorial courts? The telegram from the Attorney-General to the United States district attorney, which was seen by counsel for these claimants, directed the United States district attorney to—

"Be sure and see that the indictments against Mansfield, McMurray, and Cornish are dismissed before the Territorial courts pass out of existence and the new State courts come into being."

If any Member of the Senate or House questions this assertion, or the action of the Department as hereinbefore outlined, let him call for all the correspondence, including the report of the special agent of the Department upon which these indictments were returned, the instructions of the Attorney-General transmitted to the United States district attorney in this case, and he will then learn from the official records of the accuracy of these statements.

This is a matter that should demand a full and complete investigation at the hands of Congress. If these statements are correct the guilty parties, WHETHER THEY BE THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES OR HIS SUBORDINATES, SHOULD BE ARRAIGNED BEFORE THE BAR OF JUSTICE, EITHER IN A CRIMINAL COURT OR BEFORE THE BAR OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES IN IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS.

This is supposed to be an Administration under which the "square-deal" ideal prevails. If this is a "square-deal" Administration, if Congress is imbued with the rudimentary principles of a "square deal" and common honesty in the administration of a trust which it has assumed, then let these principles of a "square deal" be applied to all persons alike, THOSE HOLDING HIGH OFFICIAL POSITION AS WELL AS THOSE IN THE LOWLY WALKS OF LIFE.

In the eastern district of Oklahoma as a result of these manipulations the words "Federal administration" and "Federal justice" are looked upon as mere shallow, hollow mockery, and as synonymous and interchangeable terms with "robbery," "pillage," and "theft" committed in the name of the Government of the United States and under the guise of Federal administrative authority.

DECEPTION PRACTICED ON CLAIMANTS.

Another evidence of the fraud practiced by the Indian officials and their attorneys, in order to defeat the rights of claimants, is found in the following notice which was sent out broadcast to claimants. Appointments had been made in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations for the examination of these people. Receiving the following notice from the attorneys of the nations they did not appear at the appointed places, as they so advise counsel, and in many instances judgments by default were entered by reason of their failure to so appear, and it was held by the Commission that their claims were therefore barred by their failure to appear at the appointed places and times:

SOUTH MCALESTER, IND. T.,
November 10, 1900.

———— ————, Durant, Ind. T.:

You are hereby advised, in compliance with the direction of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes that the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations object to your enrollment upon the ground: No right to enrollment.

You are further advised that no testimony on behalf of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations will be taken at the appointment of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes at Atoka, Ind. T., beginning December 3, 1900; and that it will not be necessary for you to appear at that time and place, unless you desire to do so in your own behalf.

THE CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS,
By MANSFIELD, MCMURRAY & CORNISH, Attorneys.

REAL INDIANS ARE NOT OBJECTING TO CLAIMANTS RECEIVING THEIR PROPERTY RIGHTS.

It is not the full-blood Choctaws and Chickasaws that are objecting to claimants receiving their property rights. It is the mixed breed, in most cases one thirty-second or one sixty-fourth Indian blood, or the intermarried or adopted citizen, without one drop of Indian blood, who has been given a property right under acts of Congress or through favoritism extended by the administrative officers, in both cases without authority of law. It is from this class of people that the protests against claimants receiving their property come—the same designing class of people who held practically the entire trust estate for their exclusive use and benefit prior to the intervention of the Government of the United States, and who were directly responsible for the intervention by the United States in order to protect the rights of the great majority of the rightful beneficiaries under the trust.

Whatever may have been the real purpose of Congress in interfering in the affairs of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians—whether it was the patriotic and laudable desire to administer upon this trust estate, so that every person who was in law, equity, and good conscience entitled to receive his individual share should receive it, or whether the intervention was for political and selfish purposes—certain it is that conditions in these nations are in an infinitely worse condition than before the intervention of the Federal Government. Before this intervention claimants were permitted to live upon their lands and to enjoy the improvements made thereon and the fruits of their labor. Under the criminal mismanagement of this estate by administrative officers of the Federal Government many of claimants have been driven from their homes in which they have lived all their lives; driven from the land they have cultivated for fifty years; their homes and all their improvements thereon, the result of the savings of years, given to white men—adopted or intermarried. In many instances the result of the labor of a family for a generation has been confiscated by the Federal Government and the property turned over to either a white intermarried or an adopted citizen or some worthless mixed breed, probably one sixty-fourth Indian blood, too indolent to ever erect a home in which to live.

ACTUAL CASE.

Let us illustrate this further by an actual case. A person of seven-eighths Choctaw blood, who was married to a woman of three-quarters Choctaw, was living in the home built by his grandfather on this trust property. He was one of that class of persons known as a "court-judgment citizen," as he, his wife, and their children had been decreed by judgment of the United States district court for the southern district of the Indian Territory to be a Choctaw Indian by blood and descent, and duly enrolled as such by the Commission. The judgment of the United States district court in his case had been vacated by the decision of that now famous legislative commission known as the "Choctaw-Chickasaw citizen court." Some time after the rendition of the decree of this legislative commission, Indian police were sent to his home to eject him from the land and home built by his grandfather, and in which he was born. They arrived at midnight during the latter part of November. It was a cold, inclement night, sleeting and raining. When these officers arrived his wife was in the throes of childbirth. They served notice on him that he must vacate his home that night. He pleaded with them not to enforce the order, as it was impossible to move his wife. The officers refused. Grabbing his rifle he attempted to shoot the Indian police. His wife pleaded with him not to commit such an act. Finally the Indian police agreed that he and his wife might remain until 5 o'clock the next morning. Shortly after daybreak the new-born child was wrapped in a blanket and the wife was laid in a lumber wagon and driven to a neighbor's house several miles distant. That home, with all the improvements placed upon it by his grandfather, his father, and himself, is now in the possession of an intermarried citizen who has no legal right to the property.

BLOOD RELATIVES OF CLAIMANTS CLAIMING THROUGH THE SAME COMMON ANCESTORS ON TRIBAL ROLLS AND CLAIMANTS DENIED ENROLLMENT.

These 10,000 claimants acquired their right to share in this trust property from the same common source from which the great majority of those who have been enrolled as blood citizens acquired their rights. In many instances the grandmother and grandfather, or grandmother or grandfather, or mother and father, or mother or father, or sisters and brothers, or sister or brother, or other blood relatives of claimants, have been enrolled and have received their individual share of this trust property. The certified records contained in volumes 1 and 2, Senate Report No. 5013, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, show these to be incontestable facts.

CHILDREN OF SIGNERS OF TREATY OF 1830, UNDER WHICH GRANT WAS MADE, DENIED THEIR RIGHTS.

In other cases the children of the signers of the treaty of 1830, under which the grant was made, have been denied their rights, notwithstanding the fact that they have been residing in the Choctaw or Chickasaw Nation for the last twenty-five years, as is evidenced by the following official documents in the case of John T. Williams, a resident of Swink, Choctaw Nation, and who is the son of Ambrose Williams, who was one of the REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CHOCTAW NATION WHO NEGOTIATED THE TREATY OF 1830, AND WHOSE NAME APPEARS THEREON AS ONE OF THE SIGNERS OF THAT TREATY.

Washington, May 4, 1907.

SIR: The Office is in receipt of three letters written by you, one addressed to the Attorney-General of the United States, one to the Department of the Interior, and one to this Office, relative to your enrollment as a citizen of the Choctaw Nation and saying that you are going to have your rights as a citizen before you quit, and that you are going to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In reply, the Office can only repeat what it has told you heretofore, that it has no jurisdiction to consider any citizenship matter since the 4th of March, 1907, and that there is now no authority of law for placing the name of any person on any of the rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory.

THERE WAS NO QUESTION IN YOUR CASE AS TO YOUR INDIAN BLOOD, AND IT WAS NOT DENIED BY THE COMMISSIONER TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES THAT YOU WERE A PERSON OF INDIAN BLOOD. However, the possession of Indian blood was not enough under the law to justify your enrollment as a citizen of the Choctaw Nation. There are many persons of Indian blood who are not entitled to enrollment as citizens of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory.

The Office has no reason to object to your appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, if you so desire.

Very respectfully,
C. F. LARRABEE,
Acting Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
COMMISSIONER TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

In the matter of the application for the enrollment of John T. Williams et al. as citizens by blood of the Choctaw Nation.

DECISION.

It appears from the record herein that application was duly made to the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes for the enrollment of John T. Williams and his six minor children, Willie Jesse, Janie Virginia, Leona Gertrude, Johnnie David, Nannie Candler, and Jimmie Clarence Williams, as citizens by blood of the Choctaw Nation, within the time limited by the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 26, 1906 (34 Stats., 137).

The record in this case shows that John T. Williams was born about the year 1856 and is the son of AMBROSE WILLIAMS, AN ALLEGED ONE-HALF BLOOD CHOCTAW INDIAN, and Sarah Williams, a noncitizen white woman, and that the minor applicants herein are the children of said John T. Williams and E. C. Williams, a noncitizen.

It does not appear from the record herein or from the records in possession of this office that any of the applicants herein has ever been enrolled by the Choctaw tribal authorities or admitted to Choctaw citizenship by a duly constituted court or committee of the Choctaw Nation, or by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, or by the United States court in Indian Territory, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1896 (29 Stats., 321).

I am, therefore, of the opinion that the application made for the enrollment of John T. Williams, Willie Jesse Williams, Janie Virginia Williams, Leona Gertrude Williams, Johnnie David Williams, Nannie Candler Williams, and Jimmie Clarence Williams as citizens by blood of the Choctaw Nation should be denied, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stats., 495), and it is so ordered.

TAMS BIXBY, Commissioner.

MUSKOGEE, IND. T., October 15, 1906.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
COMMISSIONER TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

In the matter of the application for the enrollment of Loutitia Williams as a citizen by blood of the Choctaw Nation.

DECISION.

It appears from the record herein that on June 20, 1906, application was made to the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes for the enrollment of Loutitia Williams as a citizen by blood of the Choctaw Nation, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 26, 1906 (34 Stats., 137).

The record in this case shows that the applicant, Loutitia Williams, was born on April 29, 1905, and is the daughter of John T. Williams, an applicant for enrollment as a citizen by blood of the Choctaw Nation, and whose application for enrollment as such has heretofore been denied by the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, and E. C. Williams, a noncitizen.

I am, therefore, of the opinion that Loutitia Williams is not entitled to enrollment as a citizen by blood of the Choctaw Nation, and that her application for enrollment as such should be denied under the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress approved April 26, 1906 (34 Stats., 137), and it is so ordered.

TAMS BIXBY, Commissioner.

MUSKOGEE, IND. T., October 17, 1906.

ROLLS MADE BY ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS NOT FINAL.

Section 29 of the act approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stat. L., 495) provided:

"That all the lands within the Indian Territory belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians shall be allotted to the members of said tribes so as to give to the members of these tribes, so far as possible, a fair and equal share thereof, considering the character and fertility of the soil and the location and value of the lands."

The same section provides:

"That each member of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes * * * shall, where it is possible, have the right to take his allotment of land, the improvements on which belong to him, and such improvements shall not be estimated in the value of his allotment * * * and due care taken that all persons entitled thereto have allotments made to them."

Section 11 of the supplemental agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. L., 641) provided:

"There shall be allotted to each member of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes * * * land equal in value to 320 acres of the average allottable land of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations."

Section 21 of the act approved June 28, 1898, directed the Commission to enroll all persons of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood, and then declared:

"The rolls 'SO MADE,' when approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be final, and the persons whose names are found thereon with their descendants thereafter born to them, with such persons as may intermarry according to tribal laws shall alone constitute the several tribes which they represent."

Section 16 of the act approved April 26, 1906, provided:

"When allotments as provided by this and other acts of Congress have been made to all members and freedmen of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes. * * *"

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to sell and dispose of the residue of said lands.

As the rolls are not "SO MADE" as directed by the act of 1898, and as "ALLOTMENTS AS PROVIDED BY THIS AND OTHER ACTS OF CONGRESS" have not been made to all members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, it follows of necessity that the rolls are not final, notwithstanding the fact they have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 2 of the act of April 26, 1906, provided:

"That the rolls of the tribes affected by this act shall be fully completed on or before the 4th day of March, 1907, and the Secretary of the Interior shall have no jurisdiction to approve the enrollment of any person after that date."

The ROLLS ARE NOT FINAL BECAUSE UPWARD OF 10,000 PERSONS OF CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIAN BLOOD AND DESCENT HAVE NOT BEEN ENROLLED, AND THE ALLOTMENTS ARE NOT FINAL BECAUSE ALLOTMENTS HAVE NOT BEEN MADE TO EVERY PERSON ENTITLED THERETO.

GRANTING OF RELIEF ASKED BY CLAIMANTS WILL NOT DISTURB TITLES IN THESE TRUST LANDS.

Claimants are not asking relief that will unsettle conditions in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. They are not asking to disturb titles to allotments heretofore made. They are asking merely the right, freely enjoyed by each and every one of the persons enrolled, to select from the unallotted lands allotments equal in value and extent to the allotments heretofore selected by those persons enrolled by the administrative officers. There is still remaining approximately 3,000,000 acres of unallotted lands, the common property of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and from these unallotted lands claimants desire the right to select their allotments. Is it possible that although they are beneficiaries, equal with those persons who have been enrolled by the administrative officers, under the treaties and the grant, and each and every act of Congress, that because of errors of law, fraud and gross mistake of fact committed by the administrative officers, they are to-day remediless? To assert that they are is to assert a proposition so monstrous that it can receive no sanction or recognition by a tribunal composed of honest men.

RELIEF SHOULD BE AFFORDED CLAIMANTS WITHOUT DELAY.

We have already shown by incontestable evidence that—

I.

By the treaty of 1830 it was stipulated and agreed that the fee to the property in controversy should be conveyed to the Choctaw Nation, to be held by said nation IN TRUST for the EXCLUSIVE USE AND BENEFIT OF THOSE PERSONS WHO COMPRISED THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY OF INDIANS, AS IT EXISTED ON THE 27th DAY OF SEPTEMBER, 1830, AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

II.

That it was stipulated and agreed by the treaty that the grant should be a PRESENT GRANT in FEE SIMPLE.

III.

That on the 23d day of March, 1842, the President issued a patent conveying the legal title to the property in controversy to the Choctaw Nation IN TRUST FOR THE EXCLUSIVE USE AND BENEFIT OF THOSE PERSONS WHO COMPRISED THE CHOCTAW COMMUNITY ON THE 27th DAY OF SEPTEMBER, 1830, AND THEIR DESCENDANTS.

IV.

That by the treaty of January 17, 1837, the Chickasaw people acquired, by purchase, an equal, undivided, individual interest in the common trust property of the Choctaws, on the same terms that the Choctaws held it, namely, EVERY PERSON WHO WAS A MEMBER OF THE CHICKASAW COMMUNITY ON THE 17th DAY OF JANUARY, 1837, ACQUIRED A VESTED INDIVIDUAL UNDIVIDED INTEREST IN THE COMMON TRUST PROPERTY OF THE CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS EQUAL WITH EVERY OTHER MEMBER OF THE CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW COMMUNITIES, as did also HIS OR HER DESCENDANTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THEIR BIRTH.

V.

That residence upon the land was not one of the conditions upon which the grant was made, and, therefore, no person could lose his or her property interest in the common trust property by failure to live thereon.

VI.

That by the treaty of April 28, 1866, ALL PERSONS THERETOFORE HELD IN SLAVERY by the Choctaws and THEIR DESCENDANTS BORN PRIOR TO APRIL 28, 1866, acquired, by purchase, a vested individual interest in the common trust property equal to 40 acres of land, contingent upon the division of the trust property in severalty prior to the demise of such persons, and in the event of his death before the division of the property his property right became extinct, as it was incapable of being transmitted to his children or heirs.

VII.

That under the various Congressional enactments, and agreements with a majority of the members of the tribes, providing for the preparation of tribal rolls, the division of the common trust property, and the dissolution of the tribal governments as administered by administrative officers, thousands of persons of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood and their descendants have been denied their vested, individual property rights in this common trust property.

VIII.

That thousands of intermarried and adopted citizens, possessed of no Indian blood and possessed of no rights in the common trust property, under the treaty and the grant have received distributive shares thereof without authority of law.

IX.

That thousands of descendants of persons held in involuntary servitude by the Choctaws, and born since the ratification of the treaty of January 17, 1866, have been allotted 40 acres of the average allottable lands of this trust property without authority of law.

X.

That more than a million dollars of the trust funds of these people have been appropriated without authority of law and paid to attorneys to defeat the rights of persons who were legally, equitably, and in good conscience entitled to share in this common trust property.

XI.

That thousands of persons have been denied their vested property rights in this common trust property through maladministration, bribery, official misconduct, criminal negligence, and mistake on the part of administrative officers.

XII.

That thousands of blood citizens have been denied their property rights and their property given to white people and negroes without authority of law.

XIII.

That the Government has hereby become liable to the legal beneficiaries under the trust to the extent of millions of dollars.

It is incumbent upon the United States to make restitution; to right these wrongs. They can now be corrected. Delay will prove fatal, and these people will then hound Congress and the administrative officers for generations to come, if necessary, until this controversy is referred to some court of competent jurisdiction for an equitable adjustment, and when that time comes the Government of the United States will pay for its gross mismanagement of this trust estate millions of dollars to claimants.

REMEDY.

What is the remedy? Place upon the statute books Senate bill 4736, Sixtieth Congress, first session, without delay, and add to it a provision directing the Attorney-General of the United States to bring suit in the proper courts to cancel, annul, and set aside every patent issued to every person who is not of the designated class of persons for whose exclusive use and benefit the grant was made, or who was not a slave or descendant of a slave of the Choctaws, and born prior to the ratification of the treaty of 1866.

The vast sums appropriated out of these trust funds by the Government for the payment of attorneys to defeat the rights of honest claimants should be repaid, and this estate in the future should be administered largely by the courts and not by administrative officers.

Respectfully submitted.

WEBSTER BALLINGER,
ALBERT J. LEE,
Counsel for Claimants.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHOOLS.

For the maintenance, strengthening, and enlarging of the tribal schools of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole nations, and making provision for the attendance of children of parents of other than Indian blood therein, and the establishment of new schools under the control of the Department of the Interior, the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and disbursed by him under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I notice that this appropriation is only half what it was last year, as I understand it. Is it expected that Oklahoma will, before a great while, be able to provide for her own schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I should hope so, Mr. Chairman. The sum of $150,000 was appropriated two years ago, and of that sum $10,000 remained unexpended at the end of the fiscal year. For the present fiscal year $300,000 was appropriated, and during the first six months of the year $52,000 was expended; so that although the Department estimated and recommended the appropriation of $300,000 this year, the committee, in view of the fact that but $52,000 had been expended during the first six months of this fiscal year, believed that there was no good reason why the appropriation of year before last should be exceeded, so they cut the estimate in two.

Mr. MANN. The item itself, I suppose, is in the language of the provision of last year?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; it is.

Mr. MANN. It provides for the establishment of new schools, and a number of things of that sort?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Strengthening and enlarging tribal schools. Is it the expectation that anything like that will be done out of this fund, or is it simply to maintain what they have there?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose most of this will be expended in maintaining what is already there.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any idea how soon we will get rid of the matter.

Mr. CARTER rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma wishes to answer that question, and I think I will let him do so.

Mr. CARTER. We shall be able to take care of our own schools, Indians, white people, and all alike, just as soon as you allow us to tax our lands there. At present we can not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I can supplement that answer by telling the gentleman from Illinois that a bill has now been presented to the Indian Committee, and will be considered by it probably on Thursday of this week, which releases the restrictions on the alienation of a very large amount of the Indian lands in Oklahoma.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But I should like to suggest that that will be too late for the benefit of the schools this year.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to this item.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman has reference to future and not present appropriations.

Mr. MANN. I can see the necessity of the Government making appropriations for the schools there.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It will take some time for the lands to be placed on the tax rolls and for the assessors to assess and collect any taxes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. If the point of order is not insisted on, I desire to offer a small amendment, on page 38, in line 13, after the word "nations," to insert the words:

And in the Quapaw Agency, in the northeast part of Oklahoma, in Ottawa County.

I will say for the benefit of the House that there are a few Indians in the northeastern corner of Oklahoma, in Ottawa County, and there are a number of white children, children of what are known as United States parents before all were made United States citizens down there. They have had no schools, and it is very important that these children have some preparation made in order to start their schools at the same time that the children in other parts of Oklahoma get started. I shall be glad indeed to see that amendment inserted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About how many Indians are there to whom the gentleman has reference.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I do not know the number. There are several hundreds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LAWRENCE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following title:

H. R. 9218. An act amending an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes;"

H. R. 6231. An act to attach Shelby County, in the State of Texas, to the Beaumont division of the eastern district of said State and to detach it from the Tyler division of said district;

H. R. 13430. An act to authorize the Chicago, Indianapolis and Louisville Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River, in the city of Hammond, Ind.;

H. R. 14040. An act to authorize the county of Ashley, State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, at a point above Morrell, in said county and State, the dividing line between Drew and Ashley counties; and

H. R. 14781. An act to authorize Campbell County, Tenn., to construct a bridge across Powells River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 21.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of the Cape Fear River, North Carolina, from the city of Wilmington to the ocean, with a view to dredging and otherwise improving the same, and thereby obtaining a minimum depth of 30 feet and of sufficient width, and to submit a plan and estimate of cost of such improvement; such plan and estimate shall embrace the said increased depth and width over and above the existing project, and also a separate plan and estimate for the increased depth and requisite width based upon the existing depth and width of the present channel from the city of Wilmington to the ocean.

Senate concurrent resolution 25.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey of the harbor at St. Augustine, St. John County, Fla., and the entrance thereto through the North and Matanzas rivers and the Matanzas Inlet, with a view to determining the formation of a channel of a minimum depth of 16 feet and a width of 300 feet from the city of St. Augustine across its outer bar to the Atlantic Ocean, and the cost of construction of necessary jetties, breakwaters, and dredging in order to accomplish said purpose.

Senate concurrent resolution 31.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of New Smyrna Inlet, in the county of Volusia and State of Florida, with a view to deepening the same, and to submit estimates therefor.

Senate concurrent resolution 32.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of the Washita River, Oklahoma, from the point of its confluence with the Red River to the town of Mountain View, in Kiowa County, Okla., with a view of dredging, cleaning out, and widening the channel, and to submit a plan and estimate for such improvements.

INDIAN APROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, in line 13, after the word "nations," insert the following:

"And in the Quapaw Agency, in the northeast part of Oklahoma, in Ottawa County."

Mr. MANN. I understand the amendment is reported for information.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have had it reported to get it before the House. I offer it as an amendment.

Mr. MANN. But I have a point of order pending against the whole proposition.

Mr. DAVENPORT. If the point of order is pending, I do not desire at this time to offer the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless we understand that the gentleman is not going to insist on his amendment I shall renew the point of order on this myself if the point of order is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Illinois withdraw the point of order?

Mr. MANN. No; I did not. This changes the law so far as it confers on the Secretary of the Interior power to dispose of this money. That is clearly a change of existing law.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Then I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOR COMPLETION OF WORK.

For the completion of the work heretofore required by law to be done by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, $143,410, said appropriation to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and who is hereby authorized to designate the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, or other suitable person or persons, to perform, under his direction, any duty now or hereafter required by law of the Secretary of the Interior relating to affairs in the Indian Territory, and to pay from this appropriation clerical and other expenses incident to such work.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to have the gentleman reserve the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve it. The point of order I expect to make, unless the gentleman from New York convinces me to the contrary, is to that part of the paragraph beginning after the word "Interior," in line 1, page 39 of the bill, down to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. It gives the Secretary of the Interior the right to devolve the duties incumbent on him under prior acts upon the agent at the Union Agency, rather than to continue a Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes. It is possible for him to require under this provision the agent at the Union Agency to represent him in all matters pertaining to the tribe.

Mr. MANN. The provision says that—

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to designate the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, or other suitable person or persons, to perform under his direction any duty now or hereafter required by law of the Secretary of the Interior relating to affairs in the Indian Territory.

I never heard a proposition to confer such broad power upon any Department officer of the Government. We say in advance that if we shall require hereafter the Secretary of the Interior to exercise certain discretion or power in the Territory, he may designate anybody he pleases to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We did authorize the Secretary of the Interior to appoint a Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes to perform the duties which devolved upon him.

Mr. MANN. That is a different proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. That authority has expired, and what we desire to do by this provision—perhaps it is drawn pretty broad—is to permit the Secretary to call upon the agent at the Union Agency, who is now there, to perform the duty, and also to discharge the duties that have heretofore been discharged by the five Commissioners, and thereafter by one Commissioner, to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. MANN. If we say by law that the Secretary of the Interior shall have the power to do so and so, haven't we a right to assume that we are entitled to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and hold him responsible?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have when we do that.

Mr. MANN. This provision would relieve him of all responsibility of anything in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have heretofore said that the duties that devolved upon him could be discharged by the Commissioner he named, and he did discharge the duties. Now, the time during which that Commissioner could discharge those duties has expired. It is suggested that this change be made so that he can devolve the same duties on another official.

Mr. MANN. Is this a request which he sent in?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is.

Mr. MANN. I think some 15-cent clerk in the Department must have drawn this provision; I am sure it had not the approval of the Secretary of the Interior himself.

Mr. SHERMAN. It did meet the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury; at least it comes to us with the approval of both officials.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask why the work will not be completed during the fiscal year?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because the allotments are not completed in all tribes. Allotments have not been equalized, the surplus lands have not been sold, and until all that is done we must have some forces down there to carry on the business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There were five Commissioners, and their work was so dragged out and unsatisfactory——

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the gentleman does them an injustice to say that. The work did seemingly drag a little bit, but additional responsibilities and duties were placed upon that Commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. SHERMAN. By added legislation their work was enlarged and extended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point I was about to make was that for some reason the five Commissioners were abolished and the work devolved upon one Commissioner.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; that was done because the work was lessening, and it was thought that one competent man ought to be capable of exercising all the executive duties required under the statute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have been ten years at that work.

Mr. SHERMAN. Hardly that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Curtis Act was passed in 1898.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; about that; yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How long is it contemplated that this will last?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is believed that three years at the outside will wind up fully all the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes; and it is believed that the appropriation required for another year will be not to exceed one-half that necessary for the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order to that portion of the paragraph on page 39, commencing with the word "and" after the word "Interior" in line 1, to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is new legislation, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For support and education of 600 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., and for pay of superintendent, $102,200.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

After line 19, on page 41, insert:

"There shall not be paid out of any appropriation made in this act any greater rate of annual compensation to any superintendent of the Indian schools during the fiscal year 1909 than is authorized and paid out of appropriations made for the fiscal year 1908.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that it is not germane to this particular provision. I am entirely willing to agree to return to the general provisions and have the gentleman offer such an amendment and will agree to it. I have no objection to the amendment, but it does not belong here.

Mr. TAWNEY. My reason for offering the amendment is that in going through the bill I observe there is no limitation whatever upon the compensation to be paid to these superintendents of Indian schools. Heretofore the bill has specifically provided for their salaries at so much per annum.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was all explained the other day when the gentleman was busy elsewhere. I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think, notwithstanding the reason, that there is some necessity for a limitation on the appropriation, and I think it is germane to this. It applies not only to this school, but to all the schools that have superintendents, and will be compensated for out of the appropriations made in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman think the amendment should properly go?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not object to the limitation, but I object to its being in the wrong place. I suggest that it is not proper here.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman suggest it should properly go?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a general limitation upon the appropriation for the support of all the schools.

Mr. OLMSTED. It should go at the end of page 52.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or right before "Arizona," on page 53, where the general provisions are inserted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Very well, I am perfectly willing to put it in there if the gentleman will return to that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think it should go in after line 5 on page 7.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and that that is the better place for this provision, after line 5 on page 7.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 7, and, after the end of line 5, to insert the amendment which I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "pupils," line 17, page 41, insert "including Alaskan Indians."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Oregon desire to be heard?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Yes, sir; I would if the gentleman will reserve the point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, this school is located within the district of my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY], who is now absent from the House on business and by leave of the House, and I have been requested by constituents of his to offer this amendment when the proper point in the bill was reached. It seems that by reason of the increased facilities afforded for the education of Indians in the reservation schools this school has not been at all times kept up to its fullest capacity. It is a school affording special facilities for higher education, and a number of Indian pupils from Alaska would like to avail themselves of the opportunity of being educated there, but the Department has refused to give them admission. Now, by reason of the climatic conditions of southeastern Alaska, from which most of the pupils would come, and of that section of the State of Oregon where this school is located, it is probably the best adapted of any of the schools that are taking up the higher branches of Indian education to care for these pupils. There may be but few—I think there are comparatively few—who desire to embrace the opportunity, but I would like to see the provision of the law so broadened that they might do so in the event they offer themselves. I very much regret the chairman of the committee has seen fit to raise the point of order against it, because I believe there is merit in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make the point of order?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAMBERLAIN SCHOOL.

For the support and education of 200 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Chamberlain, S. Dak., and for pay of superintendent, $35,400; For general repairs and improvements, $2,500; In all, $37,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that this total is incorrect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was going to ask when we got to the end of the bill to correct several totals.

Mr. MANN. That is where we will make amendments, I suppose. If the proposition of the gentleman covers it, very well; but this total is manifestly incorrect.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then we had better correct it now. I ask unanimous consent that the change be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 19, page 43, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "nine."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For subsistence of the Sioux, and for purposes of their civilization, as per agreement ratified by act of Congress approved February 28, 1877, $500,000: Provided, That this sum shall include transportation of supplies from the termination of railroad or steamboat transportation, and in this service Indians shall be employed whenever practicable: And provided further, That the number of rations issued shall not exceed the number of Indians on each reservation, and any excess in the number of rations issued shall be disallowed in the settlement of the agent's account: Provided further, That the unexpended balance for the fiscal year 1908 is hereby appropriated and made available for 1909.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman himself will move to strike out that last proviso. He made no objection to striking it out the other day, and I think he does not want to inaugurate a policy——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not oppose the motion, but I prefer the gentleman to make the motion, however.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the provision at the bottom of page 45, which reads:

Provided further, That the unexpended balance for the fiscal year 1908 is hereby appropriated and made available for 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pages 45 and 46, strike out the proviso beginning on line 23, page 45, and extending to and including line 2 on page 46.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance of the asylum for insane Indians at Canton, S. Dak., for incidental and all other expenses necessary for its proper conduct and management, including pay of employees, and for necessary expense of transporting insane Indians to and from said asylum $25,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. How many insane Indians were in this asylum last year?

Mr. SHERMAN. Sixty-two.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any intention to discontinue this asylum, I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no indication of any such intent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought now that the "reason" for retaining the asylum had disappeared the committee would have considered the advisibility of discontinuing it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from New York remembers very well his attempts and mine to strike this provision from the bill, and that was at a time when there was a good deal more reason for not appropriating for its support than there is now. It has been maintained for some years, and it has reached a point where we are supporting quite a few insane Indians.

Mr. MANN. How many?

Mr. SHERMAN. Sixty-two.

Mr. MANN. At $500 apiece?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not quite that. If it were fifty Indians it would be $500 apiece. It is an excessive cost, of course. It is not excessive when you consider the number of the insane, however, that are there maintained. That is all I can say about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The cost of maintaining the insane here in Washington is considered high, and that is $220 per capita, and it costs $440 in this asylum.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very high per capita cost. Nobody can deny that proposition, but it is the only asylum for the insane Indians that is maintained anywhere; and considering the fact that there are but sixty-two patients, I think perhaps the cost is not excessive. At these other asylums, like the one in the District, to which the gentleman has referred, and the various hospitals throughout the State of New York, where the per capita cost is very much less than at Canton, of course the number of patients runs all the way from 700 to 800 up to 2,500.

Mr. MANN. Are there only sixty-two insane Indians in the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there are many more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all that are confined.

Mr. SHERMAN. At Canton.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I knew any way to take care of these Indians I would suggest striking out this paragraph, because whatever excuse there may be for keeping Indians together in a school, I have never been able to appreciate the argument that required Indians exclusively to inhabit an insane asylum. I appreciate the disadvantages under which the Commissioner has labored, and still labors, perhaps, under this provision. I simply wish to call attention to it in the hope that the Department, which I think should investigate and make the recommendations, would suggest some way by which these sixty-two Indians be taken care of in other institutions and the Government saved the cost of maintaining this one.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction and extension of an irrigation system within the diminished Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, $125,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves the point of order on what portion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do that for the purpose of asking, Mr. Chairman, why this appropriation is not made reimbursable to the Government. The Shoshone Reservation was allotted——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my attention has not been called to this item, but now that the gentleman has called my attention to it I think there is no question but that it should be made reimbursable from the sale of lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, with this point of order pending, it being ten minutes past 5, and it also being apparent that there is going to be some little discussion, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15219, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present a petition of the Anti-Imperialistic League, signed by Moorfield Storey, president, and Erving Winslow, secretary, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Philippines and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

It is respectfully submitted that Philippine independence should be promised now by joint resolution.

A great majority of American publicists, including the President, have declared themselves unequivocally in favor of Philippine independence. Mr. Taft alone, while setting it before his countrymen as the goal toward which we must look, seems not to desire it.

He postpones the day for a generation at least, and when that time is gone he hopes that both countries will agree "that it would be mutually beneficial to continue a governmental relation between them like that between England and Australia." That is his hope, and so long as he can control our policy his object must be to realize that hope. As though it were possible for a country adapted only for the habitation of an alien race to hold a position toward a "parent nation" like that of a territory peopled and occupied by its own emigrants.

He prophesies "that during the next twenty-five years a development will take place in the agricultural and other business of the Philippine Islands which will be as remarkable in its benefits to the United States and the Philippine Islands as was the development of Alaska during the last ten or fifteen years."

He insists that "the presence of Americans in the islands is essential to the due development of the lower classes." He wants the American Government to remain in the islands "long enough to educate the entire people," which means an indefinite future when we consider how long it has taken to educate our own people. He thinks that "meantime they will be able to see and the American public will come to see the enormous material benefit to both, arising from the maintenance of some sort of a bond between the two countries." He insists that "the having such an outpost as the Philippines, making the United States an Asiatic power for the time, will be of immense benefit to its merchants and its trade." He recommends that "the present restrictions be removed as to the acquisition of mining claims and the holding of lands by corporations in the Philippines." He does not "think it improper, in order to secure support for the policy of the Administration, to point out the advantage to the United States of holding the islands." He wishes to attract American capital and to see American investments in railroads, mines, and plantations. He wishes, in a word, to plant as much American treasure in the islands as possible, to make it as much for American interests to retain the islands as possible, and, under cover of much vague talk about the benevolent purpose of the United States to fit the Filipinos for self-government, to pursue a policy which will create in America a strong sentiment against letting American investments pass under Filipino control. Everyone knows that the demands of capital have led the English Government and others to conquer and annex foreign territory, and no one can doubt that every American dollar planted in the Philippines will become an argument against their independence. Let Secretary Taft tell us in detail how these islands in twenty-five years are to become of such remarkable value to the United States—a value which could accrue only to a few exploiters, who would doubtless enforce a demand for imported contract labor, driving the natives to the wall and benefiting themselves at the expense of the domestic industries of the United States—let Mr. Taft elucidate his programme fully, and it will be apparent that the process means the permanence of our hold upon the islands.

While this development was proceeding for the advantage of a few capitalists, the absolute responsibility of the United States for the defense of the archipelago would continue. In the changed attitude of affairs in the East, which Mr. Taft ignores, this responsibility implies immense outlays (of which the millions to be asked of the present Congress are only the small beginning) for fortifications and an indefinitely increased naval force.

If anyone doubts this let him observe that after the value of the islands to America has been demonstrated and the question of giving them their independence comes up for decision, the Secretary bids us note "that the tribunal to decide whether the proper political capacity exists to justify independence is Congress and not the Philippine electorate. * * * The judgment of a people as to their own political capacity is not an unerring guide." Can anyone be so blind as not to see what Secretary Taft's policy is, and that it does not mean Philippine independence at all? Let the strong nation that finds the islands profitable decide whether to let them go? It is a bribed tribunal which will decide the question, and the policy of Secretary Taft is to create a situation which makes independence impossible. Secretary Taft may be right or wrong, but his real meaning is disguised by his talk of benevolence. In Lincoln's words "the inferior races are to be treated with as much allowance as they are capable of enjoying, as much is to be done for them as their condition will allow;" they are to become invaluable to the United States, and its Congress is to decide whether they shall be given their independence. Well did Lincoln say, "It is all the same old serpent."

Through their own self-government now lies the road to Filipino independence and advancement. In the words of Lincoln, addressed prophetically to Mr. Taft: "By your system you would always keep them ignorant and vicious."

In the words of President Roosevelt a year or two ago:

"It is as true of a race as of an individual, that while outsiders can help to a certain degree, yet the real help must come in the shape of self-help." Men learn to be independent by being independent—by their own mistakes. To say that the object of our policy is to help the Filipinos to self-government and ultimate independence by making them as valuable to the United States as possible, and then to let the United States decide whether to give them independence, is "to keep the word of promise to our ear and break it to our hope." We assume the position of trustee for this nation, and unfit ourselves to discharge our trust impartially. The statesman who proposes this may deceive himself, but we must not let him deceive us.

It is for the interest of both countries that the Philippines be promised their independence now. To-day the United States can obtain without doubt from the powers, including Japan, a consent to the neutralization of the islands, a protection of their independence from foreign aggression. A few years hence that consent may not be obtained. The time is ripe for the passage of a joint resolution declaring our intention to grant the Filipinos absolute independence within a short term of years.

Mr. OWEN presented a memorial of the legislature of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUTHRIE, OKLA., January 29, 1908.

I hereby certify that the within typewritten instrument is a true and correct copy of the "Memorial from the legislature of Oklahoma to the Congress of the United States, relating to the common schools in that portion of the State of Oklahoma formerly known as the 'Indian Territory,'" as passed by the house of representatives and the senate of the legislature of Oklahoma, and approved by the governor of Oklahoma this 29th day of January, 1908, and filed for record in this office.

[SEAL.]

BILL CROSS,
Secretary of State.

MEMORIAL FROM THE LEGISLATURE OF OKLAHOMA TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, RELATING TO THE COMMON SCHOOLS IN THAT PORTION OF THE STATE OF OKLAHOMA FORMERLY KNOWN AS THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Whereas common school education is one of the most important subjects of our State policy and government; and

Whereas the constitution of the State of Oklahoma declares for absolute equality and affiliations between the Indian and white races, an essential feature of which begins with affiliation in childhood and in youth in the public schools, and it is therefore important that the Indian and white children should at all times and in all localities in the former Five Civilized Nations be associated equally in the public schools and in the higher educational institutions of the State; and

Whereas equality in taxation for the support of the common schools is essential in justice to all classes; and

Whereas for reasons and considerations heretofore deemed adequate and satisfactory to the Federal Government in the allotting of land in the portion of the State of Oklahoma heretofore known as "Indian Territory" and the surrender of the tribal forms of government in the Five Civilized Nations the Federal Government deemed it wise to withhold certain of the allottees' lands from local or State taxation for varying periods of years, to the extent that the local revenue for permanent school purposes are materially diminished; and

Whereas the policy of the Federal Government has been and is to draw upon the Indian funds of the Five Civilized Nations to aid in the education of the allottees of school age; and

Whereas in practically every neighborhood of the former Indian Territory the school children are of both classes (Indian and white); and

Whereas the school system heretofore prevailing in the portion of the State known as Oklahoma Territory was by the provisions of the statehood bill made operative throughout the entire State; and

Whereas it would be impractical as well as contrary to the school laws of Oklahoma Territory (now the law of the State of Oklahoma) not to apply said laws in the plan of districting, taxation, etc., to the entire State, to the end that uniformity of public school system may be attained; and

Whereas the former Indian Territory area has been districted by the authorities of the State of Oklahoma into public school districts: Therefore be it

Resolved, That so long as Indian funds and public money of the Federal Government is appropriated to the maintenance of public schools in the former Five Civilized Nations (outside of incorporated towns) that—

1. In order to secure uniformity in granting certificates, that the State provide for the addition to its State board of education of one member, to be nominated by the Secretary of the Interior.

2. That three members of the State board of examiners, examining applicants and granting certificates to teach common schools, may be nominated by the Secretary of the Interior, or his representative in charge of the common school interests of the Five Civilized Tribes.

3. That upon each board of county examiners in each of said counties in the former Five Civilized Nations, one member of the board of county examiners, examining applicants and granting teachers' certificates, shall be appointed by said common school representative of the Interior Department.

4. Under the authority of the proper school officers of the State of Oklahoma, schools for the joint and equal attendance of the Indian allottees and white children in the same school shall be opened and maintained each year until the district tax levy and the per capita apportionment of State funds is exhausted; whereupon the superintendent representing the Interior Department shall take supervision and conduct said school by the expenditure of the allotment from the Indian fund and from the Government fund, appropriated from year to year, so as to provide, if possible, at least eight months' school in each year in every district.

5. That to maintain said schools the local authorities will levy the proper taxation upon all taxable property as authorized by law. The State of Oklahoma will apportion to every such district, according to the enumeration of all school children, the full per capita proportion of State school funds; that the Federal Government apportion to each such district where there are allottee pupils such amount of Indian national funds only as will equal the amount per capita derived from taxation and State funds and no more, believing that the Indian funds should not be drawn on (in justice to the Indians) for a per capita amount greater than their just proportion to the membership of school children in the district. And further, that Congress, in view of the withholding of said allotments of land as above stated from taxation, should appropriate from the public funds a sum total of $2 per capita of the school children of all said districts (outside of incorporated towns) in the Five Civilized Nations for annual allowance.

6. For the purpose of permanently settling those questions of the conducting and maintenance of common schools without the uncertainty and disorganizing effect incident to uncertainty from year to year, and to the end that the Indian and white children may become thoroughly affiliated and to the end that the children of African descent may have their just opportunity for separate school facilities, we respectfully ask that Congress, if in its wisdom it approve of the above plan, may adopt the same as hereafter operative so long as restrictions placed upon Indian lands shall relieve the same from local taxation for school purposes.

7. The governor will submit a certified copy hereof to the Secretary of the Interior and to both Houses of Congress without delay.

Above memorial passed the house of representatives by a unanimous vote on this the 29th day of January, 1908.

WM. H. MURRAY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed by the Senate this the 29th day of January, 1908.

T. F. MEMMINGER,
Acting President.

Approved January 29, 1908.

C. N. HASKELL,
Governor of the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUTHRIE, OKLA., January 27, 1908.

I hereby certify that the within typewritten instrument is a true and correct copy of senate concurrent resolution No. 19, as passed by the senate and house of representatives of the legislature of Oklahoma, approved by C. N. Haskell, governor of Oklahoma, January 18, 1908, and filed in this office.

LEO MEYER,
Deputy Secretary of State.

Senate concurrent resolution 19.

Senate resolution memorializing the National Congress to enact legislation that will restore the rivers tributary to the Mississippi and the Arkansas River to navigable streams.

Be it resolved by the senate and the house of representatives, That the following memorial be adopted and transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress for formal delivery to the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, to wit:

MEMORIAL.

To the President of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled.

GENTLEMEN: The senate and house of representatives representing the people of Oklahoma earnestly and respectfully call your attention to the importance of the Arkansas River as one of the great national highways prepared by nature for the internal commerce of the United States. The volume of water, especially from the mouth of the Verdigris and Grand rivers, forms a noble stream capable of a depth of 6 feet of water at all stages, which can be established at approximately the same cost as a double-track railroad along its banks. The importance of cheap transportation and the cost of water transportation being only one-tenth of railroad transportation, we do not discuss. The enlightened opinion of the United States has debated that question thoroughly, and the verdict has been rendered that the waterways of the United States shall be improved without delay.

We call your attention to important reports, copies of which are attached hereto, which demonstrate the fact that the Arkansas River has been navigated by the Government itself from the earliest history of the western settlements until railroad transportation caused the abandonment of river traffic.

Special reference is made to the report of—

Captain Aberts, Executive Document No. 295, House of Representatives, Forty-first Congress, second session, enumerating twenty steamboats on this stream, 1870.

Captain Taber's report of January 31, 1887, House of Representatives Document 150, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session.

The report of Amos Stickney, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, estimates that the stream can be put in perfect condition from Muskogee to the Mississippi River, 288 miles, for $26,677,200, and that the cost from the mouth of Grand River to Fort Smith would be $5,226,225 for a 6-foot channel and abundant improvements.

Attention is called to the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Stickney, reported December, 1900, House of Representatives Document 150, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session.

In view of the enormous coal fields in Oklahoma contiguous to the Arkansas River and the greatest oil and gas field in the world in our State, it is of national importance as well as of State importance that the Arkansas River be immediately developed.

We therefore, on behalf of Oklahoma and on behalf of the entire tributary west, respectfully pray that a fund sufficient shall be provided, not only for the prompt development of the Mississippi River from the Lakes to the Gulf, but that the great branch of the Mississippi which penetrates our State shall be immediately provided for in a substantial manner.

The State of Oklahoma is in favor of the development of the waterways of the United States, and believes that an appropriation of not less than $50,000,000 per annum should be devoted to this purpose.

We ask, therefore, that this be done, and that such part thereof shall be devoted to the improvement of the Arkansas as is justified by the flow of water of that great stream and the great commerce which is contiguous thereto or will be naturally tributary to the great transportation opportunities established on that river, and that not less than 25 per cent of the sum be expended upon the improvements within the State of Oklahoma.

We respectfully emphasize the generally conceded fact that the railroads of the country are inadequate to handle our present immense commerce. We emphasize the fact that the railroads are more suited to carry commerce of a perishable nature on which for other reasons a quicker and more expensive transportation is required, while the waterways of our country can be more judiciously used for heavier and cheap commodities.

We ask you, therefore, to give immediate vitality to the wish and need of the nation for the systematic development at once of our internal waterways, of which the Arkansas River is one of the most valuable and most important.

We submit also the following exhibits:

A MEMORIAL OF THE OKLAHOMA LEGISLATURE OF JANUARY 27, 1908.

To the President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In conveying to you our greeting, we, the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, representing nineteen States and the Territories, in eighteenth annual session at Muskogee, Okla., take this method of directing your attention to the Arkansas River and earnestly presents to your careful consideration the fact that this stream which courses its way through Oklahoma has always been considered a navigable waterway, but for obvious reasons during her Territorial existence has been permitted to deteriorate until its commerce, once so important, has disappeared almost entirely from its surface.

Extracts from Government reports relating to the Arkansas River show that the Federal Government has for the past fifty years considered the river a navigable stream. This is corroborated by these reports, which in the aggregate cover about 500 pages, together with maps, plans, and complete estimates of the cost of river improvement. Special reference is made to Captain Abert's report, 1870, page 33, Executive Document No. 295, House of Representatives, Forty-first Congress, second session, which enumerates twenty steamboats, averaging 300 tons burthen, plying between Fort Gibson, Okla., Little Rock, Ark., New Orleans, La., Memphis, Tenn., St. Louis, Mo., and Cincinnati, Ohio, and gives $5,000,000 annually as the volume of the Government freight alone received at Fort Gibson. Captain Taber, in his report for 1885, says of the expenditure on the Arkansas, that it has been of such practical value to navigation that accidents are practically unheard of, and the river, with the exception of several unimproved shoals, is in excellent navigable condition as high as Fort Gibson. Captain Taber, in this report, says:

"During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, $28,702.79 was expended in the running expenses of these two boats and in their care, as their operations seemed to give, for this reason, the greatest relief possible, and the relief most needed. Too much can not be said in favor of the wisdom of making the last appropriation apply to the entire river and leaving it to the officer in charge to expend it as seemed most advisable. By this means a narrow channel was opened from the mouth of the river to Fort Gibson and navigation resumed at once, and this was afterwards widened as required, until at length a heavy line of packets was put on from Little Rock to the mouth, and the line that formerly plied on this reach was transferred to the reach above Little Rock. In February, 1885, the boats actually made their regular time by night, and on one occasion I traveled upon the heaviest snag boat from dark until nearly midnight, the pilot having no difficulty whatever, and this at a medium stage of water, too."

In all the reports there are statistics relative to the improvement of the Arkansas as high as Arkansas City, Kans. Captain Taber, in his report, January 23, 1886, says:

"There is no doubt that a 2-foot channel can be provided whenever the development of the country warrants it, and the river should be, for all purposes of law, rated as navigable to Wichita, Kans." (P. 2, Ex. Doc. No. 90, H. R., 49th Cong., 1st sess.)

In Captain Taber's report, submitted January 31, 1887, the following statement occurs:

"For over two years I have been engaged in personal conversation, as opportunity occurred, with old navigators of the river and old residents along the banks, and with my object concealed have received uniform testimony that in past years the Arkansas River flowed through a much narrower channel, and that then, but for the snags, no boats such as now navigate it had any difficulty in doing so. This testimony is universal." (P. 1386.)

In examination and survey of Arkansas River, House of Representatives Document 150, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, report dated December 7, 1900, the following statement occurs:

"For a large part of the year all these depths (2 to 2.26 feet at mouth of Grand River) would be greater and the channels wider, and for short periods at long intervals they would be less. (P. 2.)

"Fort Gibson, on the Grand River, 2 miles above its mouth, has always been considered the head of navigation. (P. 5.)

"From an engineering point of view the board believes that the improvement of the river is feasible for open-river navigation from its mouth to the mouth of the Grand River." (P. 22.)

The following report is signed by Amos Stickney, lieutenant-colonel, engineers, United States Army:

"From the mouth of the Grand River, opposite the Muskogee Hyde Park landing to Little Rock, the distance is 288 miles, and the board that reported December 6, 1900, states that it will require but $26,677,200 for improvements, and from the mouth of the Grand River to Fort Smith, according to John Wilson, brigadier-general, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, the cost will be $5,226,225, with a channel depth of 6 feet. This will be permanent improvement.

"Up to this date the total amount expended on the Arkansas River by the Federal Government reaches the sum of $744,253.74."

The report of Amos Stickney, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, submitted December, 1900 (H. Doc. No. 150, 56th Cong., 2d sess.), gives full and complete estimates. This report says, pages 2 and 3:

"From Grand River to Little Rock: The board is of opinion that open-river channels can be obtained in this section, although they would necessarily be small and in the upper part of the reach very shallow during low-water seasons and of doubtful utility at such times. The plan presented for improvement for open-river navigation contemplates the probable attainment of channels 300 feet in surface width, with mean depth at ordinary low water of 4.5 to 5 feet at Little Rock, 4 to 4.5 feet at Dardanelle, 3 to 3.5 feet at Fort Smith, and 2 to 2.25 feet at mouth of Grand River. For a large part of the year all of these depths would be greater and the channels wider, and for short periods at long intervals they would be less. The estimates of cost, by reaches, are as follows:

Little Rock to Dardanelle (38 miles)	$4,468,825
Dardanelle to Fort Smith (106.3 miles)	5,585,875
Fort Smith to mouth of Grand River (93.1 miles)	5,226,225
Total	15,280,925

"The board states that a channel depth of 6 feet can be obtained in this section by the construction of thirty-three locks and dams, estimated to cost, including bank protection, $26,677,200, and that careful surveys would be required for the definite location of the various works, whether the method of improvement be by open-channel work or by the slack-water system.

"From Little Rock to the mouth of the river: It is the opinion of the board that the construction and maintenance of locks and dams in this section would be hazardous and very costly; that any improvement made should be for open-river navigation, and that by the latter method channels can be obtained of not less than 300 feet in width with a mean depth of about 5 feet and a central depth of about 7 feet in ordinary low water. For a large part of the year such channels would be wider and deeper. The estimates of cost, by reaches, for open-river navigation are as follows:

Mouth to Pine Bluff (108 miles)	$6,213,475
Pine Bluff to Little Rock (66 miles)	3,769,000
Total	9,982,475
Add to this the estimated cost of improvement from Grand River to Little Rock, viz	15,280,925
Grand total of cost for open-river improvement	25,263,400

"In addition to the complete formation and maintenance of channels the constant removal, at least for many years, of the snags formed by the enormous quantity of drift that passes down the river would be absolutely necessary for the safety of navigation. For this purpose a properly equipped light-draft steel-hull snag boat should be provided, at a cost estimated at $75,000, and provision made for its operation and maintenance, estimated to cost $25,000 per year.

"It is the opinion of the board that any work on improvement should be done in reaches of continuous work, beginning with the work in each reach at the head of said reach, and it emphasized the statement that satisfactory results and economy in cost can not be obtained except by continuous work, the estimates being based upon such method and upon provision of funds by yearly appropriations of sufficient magnitude to keep a working plant in continuous operation.

"Attention is respectfully invited to the statement by the board in regard to the usefulness of the improvement to navigation and its relation and value to commerce."

It is our purpose in the details narrated to emphasize the fact that the present neglected condition of the Arkansas River, especially upon the upper reaches through Oklahoma, is not a natural condition, and that it is the plain duty of the Government to restore this stream as a commercial artery and make it a blessing to the million and a half people of this State and the people of the other populous sections in other States to which it is tributary.

In view of the fact that an Inland Waterways Commission has been created and in view of the fact that the Administration has given utterance to a broad policy of international improvement, we take this method of submitting to your attention the ancient claims of the Arkansas River, trusting that speedy means will be taken to restore that historic stream to her old-time prestige as a commercial highway.

By order of the executive committee.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY F. H. NASH, FORT GIBSON, BEFORE THE MUSKOGEE COMMERCIAL CLUB, DECEMBER 5, 1907.

Responding to your invitation to meet with you and give you some of my experiences of an early day in this country, I am with you this evening, and hope I may be able to interest you for a little while.

I came to this country at an early day and on a steamboat. I left New Orleans, La., my native city, in May, 1853, then in my sixteenth year, to join my father at Van Buren, Ark., where he had been about eighteen months as bookkeeper for the old and well-known firm of P. Pennyweight & Co. My advent was made on the stern-wheeler Arkansas. After a trip of eight days was landed in Van Buren. The trip was full of excitement to me, never having been very far from home before. Pine Bluff was a small village; Little Rock could hardly be called a city. Dardanelle, Norristown, and Spaden were all small villages. No railroads west of the Mississippi; steamboating was the only mode of travel. The whistle of a steamboat brought the whole country to the river banks. They made frequent stops, taking on and putting off passengers and freight. Then, too, we had to stop very often for wood, the only fuel used. No one in those days was aware of the immense store of coal awaiting to be discovered. The river was in good condition and we had no trouble. Remember this was in May. After spending about two months with my father, nothing to do except to enjoy myself fishing and hunting, concluded to seek work of some kind, and requested my father's assistance. He succeeded in getting me a position as clerk to Mr. William P. Denckla (who, after the civil war, was the first president of the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad), sutler for the army at Fort Gibson, Ind. T. Fort Gibson was at that time headquarters for the Seventh United States Infantry, with a regimental band, and was garrisoned by B, D, and E Companies, officers and men numbering about 300. You will see by this that a good many supplies were necessary. There was a comparatively good road over the mountains to Fort Smith, 58 miles distant (the present road by rail is 70 miles), kept in repair by the Government and used for transporting supplies when there was no navigation. Very few wagons were used, our principal mode of traveling being horseback, with a pair of saddlebags to carry our belongings.

The river in those days was navigable from January or February to July or August. The Government, as well as private individuals, took advantage of the early waters, as there was generally some of it navigable by larger boats, and got their supplies for the year, for fear of drought, which meant a low river. All steamboat men counted, however, on what they called a June rise, the melting of snow in the mountains from rains and slush. They were seldom mistaken. A great deal of the late heavy water is now diverted for irrigation purposes.

I left Van Buren on the 4th day of July, 1853, to go to what has been ever since my home—Fort Gibson. Got as far as Webbers Falls and had to return to Van Buren. On the 2d day of August I made another start and was again stopped at Webbers Falls. The town is named after the falls just above it, which consists of a bridge of rocks all the way across the river, obstructing the channel. Remove these rocks out of the channel and one of the main obstructions of what has always been called the upper river will be out of the way. Our steamboat unloaded its cargo here and again turned back. I remained, hired a horse and a guide, and on the evening of the 4th of August arrived in Fort Gibson pretty tired. There was not enough water the rest of the season for boats on account of the obstruction spoken of and one or two others of the same nature. I do not remember of but one drought which affected the river sufficiently to prevent boats from navigating it from January to August, and that was in 1857 or 1859, for a period of fifteen or eighteen months. The Arkansas from its mouth up is extremely low. We hauled goods from all points on the river where they had been left by steamboats, at one time hauling from Little Rock. A good deal of this, even then, could have been avoided, if the Government had given any assistance at all to our western rivers. Like our dirt roads, the rivers need work, the nature of the banks, the freshets, all tend to make obstructions; a snag, a tree, or log off of a caving bank will lodge in the channel, catch drift and sand; no one to remove the snag, consequently the next boat has to make a new channel, and, unless in very high water, tie up at a bank all night and wait for daylight.

There were a great many boats in the river then, a good many Memphis packets which seldom got above Fort Smith. I remember the names of a few of our regular boats. There was the Thomas F. Ray, Pennywith No. 1 and No. 2, Arkansas, Arkansaw, Upire No. 2 and No. 3, Tahlequah, Young America, Thirty-fifth Parallel, Exporter, and Importer. These were all stern-wheel boats, except the Thirty-fifth Parallel which was a side-wheeler, built by Fort Smith capital and named by its owners after the city, which was, as the citizens claimed, to be the great thoroughfare for the West. Of the captains or pilots I can call to mind but a few. So many things have occurred since, so many new faces and names to remember. I remember Capt. William Nowland, Ed. Nowland, Eugene Smith, Jim Bowlin, and Williams. The Nowlands and Smiths were residents of Fort Smith, almost lived on the river, and knew what was called the "upper river." Fort Smith to Fort Gibson, by heart. The others spent most of their time in lower river. I have spent many a day with them in the pilot house and sparring over sand bars. I have not heard of them for several years. Capt. Ed. Nowland and Smith were in Memphis the last I knew of them. Capt. William Nowland was blown up on a steamboat not a great many years ago. Captain Williams carried out of the Arkansas River the largest load of cotton on record, being 5,000 bales, and was presented with a silver service by the commission men of New Orleans. What was done then can more than be done now. I believe, to a certain extent, the river above the mouth of the Grand and Verdigris rivers may be affected by irrigating in Colorado, but this can more than be made good by the constant use of a snag boat to remove obstructions in the channel and keeping it open. One or two regular boats ply the river and keep the water in motion; using these channels will prevent sand from filling them up. Another obstruction which gives trouble at a low stage is a ledge of rock at Frozen Rock, which can also be removed with a little dynamite.

I see by a recent Muskogee paper that the Frisco Railway was considering the feasibility of putting in a trolley system to Frozen Rock sufficient to transport passengers and freight and endeavor to make this the head of navigation in order to avoid raising their bridge and making a drawbridge of it. This will be objected to and resisted. Fort Gibson is the head of navigation, so laid down on maps in Washington City, and, then, too, you want Hyde Park for your landing. One more obstruction just below the Frisco bridge can be remedied with very little work, and that is an old ford called the "Rabbit Ford;" with Frozen Rock out of the way this will be a small item. I have made a good many trips from Fort Gibson to St. Louis and New Orleans and returned on steamboats, and hope to see the day when I can do it again. The railroads can not handle the products of this country as they once could. We are growing faster than the railroads are. Our cotton, corn, and potato interests are such that we need water transportation, to say nothing of the coal and oil interests, which are increasing daily. Tobacco can be raised here. I have seen it shipped. We are now a State. We will soon have farmers from all points of the United States. We should get ready for them. It used to be that boats could or did run to Fort Smith when they could not or did not run to Fort Gibson. There were two or three reasons for this. Fort Smith and Van Buren and interior towns had a good deal of freight. There was a good deal of cotton to ship out. This portion of the country in those days raised no cotton. We did not have the farmers. The two or three obstructions mentioned and the caving in of the banks—the consequence was the river not being used much, the channels were not kept open.

Not many years ago the Government put a snag boat in our river for a short time, and we had a little boat called the Border City and another, the Fort Smith, which came to see us a few times. I trust the present effort being made will be more successful, and that we will see the grand old times again, when as many as three boats and of good size have been tied up at our landing at the same time. The merchants want the freight now that the Government required then. Hyde Park will be your landing, as the Nivins Ferry landing was then for the Creek country, when Mr. Patterson, William Whitefield, and J. McCoody used to do business at the old Creek Agency 3 or 4 miles west of Muskogee. Fort Gibson then received goods from Tahlequah and the Cherokee Agency, which was 6 or 8 miles east of Fort Gibson. We also shipped large quantities of pecans, furs, and dry hides, which would have been lost to the country had it not been for the river. It is not necessary to say much about Grand River, the beautiful stream upon which Fort Gibson is located; you drink its water every day. Our honored governor spoke of it at the convention just closed in your city. Steamboat men in old times sung its praises, and they nearly always knew when the rise was out of Grand River. It has the swiftest current of any western river and supplies its full quota to the Arkansas. In the near future we believe the dam so long spoken of will be constructed and Grand River will furnish light and power, too.

ADDRESS BY CAPT. F. B. SEVERS.

I came to Fort Gibson, Ind. T., from Washington County, Ark., in the spring of 1852 and remained at Fort Gibson three years. While there I was in the employ of W. C. Dixon, who was at that time engaged in the mercantile business at Fort Gibson. He was a large dealer in general merchandise. In those days Mr. Dixon had all of his goods shipped from New Orleans and other points up the Arkansas River by boat. At that time Fort Gibson was quite a military post, both cavalry and infantry; used a great many supplies, which were all brought up the Arkansas River.

After remaining at Fort Gibson three years, I came across into the Creek Nation and embarked in the mercantile business, and I recollect very well the first stock of goods I ever brought from St. Louis. I had them shipped by boat and delivered at the mouth of Grand River, which was then known as Nivens Landing. I had several shipments made by boat and hauled from Nivens Landing to a point on Deep Fork near Okmulgee, known as Sheildsville, by ox team, and would reload these teams with pecans and hides to be taken back to Nivens Landing to be sent from there by boat to St. Louis. One shipment I made which I remember in particular consisted of 3,000 bushels of pecans, which went on boat from this point. And hide buyers and pecan buyers in those days usually sent their goods by boat.

I remember in particular several of the boats which plied the Arkansas River in those days. One in particular was the P. H. White, owned by Mr. P. H. White, a large wholesale dealer at Van Buren, Ark. Another boat was named Van Buren, after the city of that name. The Fort Smith used to make regular weekly trips. The Little Rock and the Thomas P. Ray also plied the Arkansas River in those times. All of these boats that I have mentioned were good-sized stern-wheel boats. The largest boat that I can recollect at this time ever coming up the Grand River from its mouth, known as Nivens Landing, known now as Hyde Park, was the Alabama, loaded down to the guard with military supplies for the post. This boat was a side-wheel boat. She came out nearly every year at a good stage of water. She was a boat that ran the Alabama River and was used principally on that river as a cotton boat. She was a fine boat, well finished inside, equipped with the modern improvements, including a fine bar, which was quite a sight to the people of this western country at that day.

I hope you will be successful in your great undertaking in opening up the waterways of the great West.

Sincerely,

FREDERICK B. SEVERS.

TRANS-MISSISSIPPI COMMERCIAL CONGRESS.

MUSKOGEE, December 28, 1907.

DEAR SIR: In conformity with instructions from the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress I inclose you a memorial upon the Arkansas River, urging immediate action upon the part of the National Government looking toward speedy improvement and the ultimate restoration of that river as a navigable stream.

In this connection I beg to state for your information that in conformity with instructions the inclosed memorial has been sent to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Copies were also sent to Hon. F. H. Newell, the member of the Inland Waterways Commission who represented the Commission at our Congress. I would also direct your attention to the fact that in response to the letter which went to President Roosevelt from this office the memorial not only received the personal attention of Mr. Roosevelt, but was sent by him to Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, who is not only chairman of the Inland Waterways Commission, but is also chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The correspondence in this matter I herewith attach.

It is hardly necessary for me to call your attention to the very great importance which this matter bears to Oklahoma and to direct your attention to the opportune time which is now presented to have this matter forcefully presented in the National Congress. It may, however, be necessary for me to explain to you that the organization which adopted this memorial represents all of the States west of the Mississippi River. At the meeting held in Muskogee, in November, out of 3,000 delegates appointed by the various governors, mayors, and commercial bodies over 1,500 were in actual attendance. Every State and Territory was represented by delegates of high standing. It is therefore not too much to assume that behind this memorial is the voting strength of every State without regard to political alignment. Oklahoma and Arkansas united on this proposition and, supported by the delegates from the Trans-Mississippi States, the opportunity afforded for speedy and satisfactory action in this matter will no doubt appeal strongly to you. At any rate, the executive committee of the congress felt that if the legislature of Oklahoma will place itself squarely in support of this proposition, its action will assist materially in obtaining for the Arkansas River the recognition which has so long been denied, owing to a Territorial form of government dwarfing its natural advantages. Permit me also to state for your information that this matter will be presented to Congress by our Congressional committee, and in addition thereto the printed report of our proceedings will give this subject thorough attention, which report will be ready for distribution in a few days and will be forwarded to every Senator and Representative in Congress for perusal.

Trusting that you will dispose of this matter at your earliest convenience and advise this office promptly of the result, I am,

Yours, truly,

ARTHUR F. FRANCIS,
Secretary of the Congress.

EXHIBIT E.

MUSKOGEE, OKLA., December 28, 1907.

Hon. E. E. BROOK,
Chairman Committee on Internal Improvements and Navigation, Guthrie, Okla.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In answer to your inquiry with regard to the practicability of the navigation of the Arkansas River and the possibility of the Federal support, I have to say:

First, that the navigability of the Arkansas has been absolutely demonstrated beyond possibility of doubt by the best of all evidence, continued successful navigation through a period of years. In the early settlement of the West, the United States Government had established lines of commerce on the Arkansas up to the mouth of Grand River, and the only reason for its rapid decadence was the building of railroads and the ability of the railroads to destroy water competition by the methods which we all so well understand.

I am the president of the Muskogee-Oklahoma Packet Company, and we have ordered a new steamer to ply these waters from Muskogee to the Mississippi, and of course our people would not be building this boat unless they had thoroughly examined the question as to the navigability of the stream even without any improvements thereon.

A 6-foot channel can be easily established in the Arkansas, and it could be made a great highway of commerce at a less cost than a double-track railway along its banks.

I think if the Government would take advantage of our natural gas fields and our wonderful deposits of Portland cement and producing quarries, most excellent hydraulic cement can be made in Oklahoma at a cost of less than 50 cents a barrel; that concrete piles could be sunk in the sand bars of the Arkansas by gravity and pile drivers which would control this channel permanently at a very low cost.

I am glad to know that the legislature takes a deep interest in this matter, and should rejoice to cooperate in helping to develop this great commercial highway which I plainly see on the Arkansas River.

The prompt action contemplated by the legislature is a source of great satisfaction to me.

Yours, very respectfully,

ROBT. L. OWEN.

EXHIBIT F.

Hon. ECK E. BROOK,
Chairman Committee on Internal Improvements and Navigation, Guthrie, Okla.

MY DEAR SIR: Transportation is the vital question back of the prosperity of every State and Territory in the Union, and water transportation is never to be lost where it is possible to obtain it.

Water transportation has two leading features:

First, it is the cheapest known method of transportation. Scarcely a railroad in the United States reports the actual costs of transporting a ton of freight 1 mile as low as 2 mills, and most of the roads find it impossible to approximate that amount, where water transportation average throughout a shipping season is found to be conducted at an actual cost of even less than seven-tenths of 1 mill per ton per mile. per ton per mile.

The other important feature is that the waterways are above the possibility of monopoly; they are open to the world. They furnish the highway upon which all boats may ride at will, and the ownership of a boat, at the cost of a few thousands dollars, is means of competition always open to the shippers of freight.

Waterways are the God-given opportunity for the people to forever insure themselves against the oppression of monopolizing artificial means of transportation.

A water-rate point anywhere within the borders of the State of Oklahoma is a perpetual blessing to every point within the State.

Give us a water-rate point within the borders of Oklahoma, and the corporation commission can protect the people through the control of rates within the State based on the water rate to the outside world.

The Arkansas River has been reported by the Engineers of the United States as practical for open-river navigation to the mouth of the Grand, and for slack-water navigation above the mouth of the Grand even to the mouth of the Cimarron. Many people are prone to imagine that the State derives no benefit from its navigable rivers except the immediate locality. This is not true, and a student of freight rates will readily say, Give us a water-rate point within the State and a corporation commission empowered to control rates within the State, and the whole people of the State are bound to be benefited by this rate-making influence.

These same superficial critics may say "the Arkansas River is impracticable to navigate," yet those who have carefully studied the question and know of its earlier navigation, and who know that the captains and pilots of those days assure us that since the danger from snags and drift matter in earlier days has been minimized by the clearing of the forests of the bottom lands, navigation of the Arkansas River is more practicable to-day than it was when the channel was filled with snags and fallen timber.

Again, we are told that $82,000,000 of Government money was spent on improving the Monongahela River above Pittsburg. The Arkansas River opposite Fort Gibson is more practicable of improvement than any part of the Monongahela. One-fourth of the money spent on the Monongahela, creating slack-water navigation, would make the second section of the Arkansas River a better slack-water proposition, and less than that amount would open the first section of the Arkansas (460 miles from the Mississippi to the Grand) for open-river navigation.

Again, the improvement of the Trinity River from the city of Dallas to its mouth involves a descent of 511 feet, and the Trinity in its unimproved condition has never been recognized as comparing favorably in any sense of the word with the Arkansas, and yet the Trinity is being improved and will in time be profitably navigated and will yield benefits to the people of Texas beyond the most enthusiastic expectations of those who have worked to secure the improvement.

No State can afford to neglect the opportunity to bring the steamboat within its borders. Oklahoma is the natural location for extensive manufacturing interests, as well as for vast agricultural productions, and cheap transportation is indispensable to success in manufacturing and in agriculture and is the spirit of general commerce.

Let Congress give the Arkansas one-third the money it has profitably spent upon the Monongahela, and we will forever have water rates to the mouth of the Grand. Give us another one-third of that same sum, and perpetual water transportation by fewer dams of simpler construction than those built on the Monongahela will extend permanent navigation to the mouth of the Cimarron, and no better investment of a similar sum of money could be made for the welfare of our entire State.

For the people of any other locality in Oklahoma to oppose the improvement of the Arkansas River because their town is not immediately upon its banks would be absurd, narrow-minded, as foolish as it would be for Syracuse, N. Y., to fight the improvement to the harbor at New York City, which harbor has made the whole State of New York untold millions and given that State the title of the Empire State, when in fact the State of New York itself but for its commerce would be of minor consequence. The ocean harbor at the southeast and the land harbor at the northwest are the life and the commerce of that great State, and the Arkansas can be made the vital artery in the commerce and prosperity of Oklahoma.

EXHIBIT J.

MUSKOGEE, OKLA., January 4, 1908.

Senator ECK E. BROOK,
Care Ione Hotel, Guthrie, Okla.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to know that you have introduced a joint resolution favoring the appropriation by the National Government of a sufficient sum of money to improve to its fullest degree the Arkansas River for navigation purposes.

Many of the members of the legislature may not know that about a century ago the Government located Fort Gibson, about 7 miles north of Muskogee, on the east bank of the Grand River, because it was readily accessible by steamboats, and for about seventy years Fort Gibson was the Government's point of distribution of its supplies for nearly all of the great southwestern posts. This condition continued until the first railroad to build a bridge over the Arkansas River crossed same just above where the Grand River empties into the Arkansas River, and the construction of this and other roads made the distance from points on these roads to the frontier posts much shorter than from Fort Gibson, making it impracticable to continue wagon travel from Fort Gibson to these frontier posts, and in 1872 navigation on the river began to decline and the Government ceased to pay much attention to the river, and for the past forty-odd years it has taken care of itself.

The increase of population in this new State is such that it renders imperative the improvement of the Arkansas River into and through our State. It will not be a local proposition, but will be a proposition of State-wide importance. It is the only river which enters this State which can be rendered susceptible of navigation. In 1870 the Government reports showed that there were more than twenty steamboats running from New Orleans, Cincinnati, and St. Louis up to Fort Gibson. If the traffic then would justify twenty boats, the traffic now would justify ten times that number if the river was in condition to permit of its being used for navigation.

The Government reports show that a 6-foot channel can be maintained by the Government and that the same is practicable. Therefore the Government should be called upon to appropriate sufficient money to create this 6-foot channel, not in later years, but now. A year or so ago there was a small amount of money appropriated for the improvement of the Arkansas River, and it was provided in the appropriation bill that all of it should be spent in the State of Arkansas. Your resolution should demand of the Federal Government that it appropriate money for the improvement of the Arkansas River, and provide that at least 25 per cent of the sum appropriated should be spent within the limits of the State of Oklahoma.

Trusting that you will succeed in having this joint resolution unanimously adopted, and that we will all succeed in our work in this river improvement, I am,

Very respectfully, CLIFFORD L. JACKSON,
President Muskogee Commercial Club.

THE MUSKOGEE OIL REFINING COMPANY,
Muskogee, Okla., January 1, 1908.

Hon. ECK E. BROOK,
Chairman Committee on Internal Improvements and Navigation, Senate Chamber, Guthrie, Okla.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of the One Hundred Thousand Club and the good citizens of this section of the State who are vitally interested in the navigation of our one great waterway, as must, indeed, all good citizens of Oklahoma be interested in the furtherance of navigation and improvement of this great artery of commerce, I beg to use your valued influence and best efforts in urging the immediate action of our legislature in preparing a memorial to the National Congress, requesting immediate assistance in the way of a substantial appropriation for the improvement of navigation on the Arkansas River.

The Arkansas River has for the past seventy years been by the Federal Government considered a navigable river from its mouth to the mouth of the Grand River. Four complete surveys and exhaustive reports have been made on this subject. In 1870 Capt. S. T. Abert being the engineer in charge; again in 1885 an exhaustive report was made by Capt. H. S. Taber; another exhaustive report was made by the same author in 1887; in December, 1900, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, U. S. Army, Amos Stickney, submitted a most exhaustive report, and the last and final report, not yet published, being made by the honorable Board of Army Engineers appointed this last spring by President Roosevelt, so I take it we are not in the need of any further examinations or reports on the feasibility of navigation on the Arkansas, but what we want is a substantial appropriation for the immediate commencement of actual improvement.

Pending the time when the more substantial improvements that will be necessary in order to secure year-around navigation, or greater draught, we should demand, and Congress should grant, the service of snag boats and dredge boats to the end that this great new State may avail herself of this great natural artery of commerce by making it possible during at least eight or nine months of the year for us to move our coal and oil and corn and cotton to the marts of the world independent of railway systems.

If you will go back to Captain Abert's report (Ex. Doc. No. 295, H. R. 41st Cong., 2d sess.) you will find the following statement: "Twenty steamboats, averaging 300 tons burden, now ply between Fort Smith, Little Rock, New Orleans, Memphis, St. Louis, and Cincinnati. The amount of up-and-down river trade received and shipped at Fort Smith is about 25,000 tons annually, exclusive of Government freight."

"The Government freight received at the same point amounts to about $5,000,000 annually."

Bay, Oregon, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LONG submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse Charles A. Davidson and Charles M. Campbell, late clerks of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—HENRY W. SCHRODER.

On motion of Mr. DICK, it was Ordered, That there may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate all papers relative to the bill (S. 2408) granting an increase of pension to Henry W. Schroder, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, there having been no adverse report thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOHN W. ARMITAGE.

On motion of Mr. DICK, it was Ordered, That there may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate all papers relating to the bill (S. 2412) granting an increase of pension to John W. Armitage, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, there having been no adverse report thereon.

L. K. SCOTT.

The bill (H. R. 2756) for the relief of L. K. Scott was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BURNHAM. This bill, which has passed the House, is identical with Senate bill 820, which is on the Calendar under Rule IX. I desire to call up Senate bill 820 and to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNHAM. Now, I ask for the present consideration of the House bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to L. K. Scott the sum of $7,500 for royalty upon telescopic sights; and said sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims in behalf of said Scott, or his estate, against the United States arising from the use of said telescopic sights; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $7,500 for the purposes specified in this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. From what committee does the bill come?

Mr. BURNHAM. From the Committee on Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a House bill, which by agreement has been substituted for a like bill of the Senate, reported from the Committee on Claims, and placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the Senate bill was unanimously reported?

Mr. BURNHAM. I understand so. A similar bill was reported in the last Congress and passed by the Senate, but failed to pass the House. This bill has passed the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. Does a report accompany the Senate bill?

Mr. BURNHAM. There is a report accompanying it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that the Senate bill is identical with the House bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. It is identical with the House bill, and there is a report accompanying the Senate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report was read in the Senate the other day.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. WARNER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT.

Intended to be proposed by Mr. WARNER to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

In line 15, page 4, section 2, after the word "taxes," insert the following:

"Bonds of Porto Rico issued in pursuance to authority granted by Congress."

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted the following amendment to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amend section 8 by striking out the first five lines and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That on and after January 1, 1909, two-thirds of the reserve required by law to be held by national banking associations shall be kept in their vaults, either in the funds now required by law or in bonds mentioned in this act: Provided, That not more than one-half of the reserve so required to be kept in the vaults of national banks shall be in such bonds."

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit a proposed amendment to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I would rather have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 15, after the word "withdrawn," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the total withdrawal of circulating notes issued by all national banking associations shall not exceed $9,000,000 in any calendar month.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any speech at this time, but I just want to give a little explanation of the reason why I think it very important that this phase of legislation shall be considered.

I find that the original banking act of 1874, in this same section 9, had a provision which "provided that not more than $3,000,000 of lawful money shall be deposited during any calendar month for this purpose"—that is, for the purpose of withdrawing circulation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the original act of 1874 did not contain any such provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have the act in my hand and I am reading from it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the act was amended in 1882.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is the act of 1882. I meant 1882. I see that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] smiles approval, and I know that when I look to him for information I always get it. He has a most wonderful memory, even better than the Senator from Rhode Island. Anyhow, it is 1882; and there was a provision in the act as amended prohibiting the withdrawal of more than $3,000,000 a month.

Last year the Senator from Rhode Island introduced and the Senate passed an amendment to this same section 9, which provided "that not more than $9,000,000 of lawful money shall be deposited during any calendar month" for purposes of withdrawal. I now find that the act which he introduced, S. 3023, and which will soon be under consideration, known as the "Aldrich bill," strikes out this proviso and leaves no limitation whatever on the amount of money that may be withdrawn from circulation by the national banks.

While I am not entirely clear in my own mind as to the result of such action, it appears to me that if it was thought necessary in 1882 to prohibit the banks to withdraw more than $3,000,000, and if it was thought necessary last year to prohibit the banks to withdraw more than $9,000,000, it is a remarkable thing that now we propose to allow the banks to issue $500,000,000, in addition to the regular circulation, about $700,000,000, and we will then turn them loose after we allow them to inflate the currency to $1,200,000,000 and permit them to contract it at will, without a scintilla of authority anywhere other than the Secretary of the Treasury to stop them.

Mr. ALDRICH. And the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Comptroller of the Currency is under the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not as to this matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will have his own time and can explain why he has thought it worth while to omit this important proviso.

As I said, I do not propose to make a speech this morning, because I am feeling quite unwell, but in a day or two I hope to be able to present some reasons to show why this is a fearfully dangerous power to be vested anywhere, and that we can not safely pass this proposed law without some provision which will limit the power of the national banks to inflate and to reduce the volume of currency at will.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that Senate bill 3023 may be taken up at this time. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] desires to submit some remarks.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any extended remarks upon the subject before us. I realize the fact that the bill that has been reported by the Committee on Finance will pass this body, and my sole object now is to explain the vote that I shall cast upon this occasion. We have the consolation of knowing that even if this bill passes it is simply and solely an emergency measure, brought into existence by the occasion that produces it, and intended only as a temporary remedy for the evils that it is supposed to prevent and counteract.

IMPERFECTIONS OF PRESENT SYSTEM.

I shall assume, for the sake of argument, that our national banking system will continue for the present and for some time in the future, and, therefore, considering that the bill is wholly ineffective for the purposes for which it is designed, I conceive it to be my duty to state that I regard the system so full of errors and imperfections that I believe the day must come when we shall be compelled to change some of its essential features and adopt entirely new plans and provisions that shall be acceptable to the people and commensurate with the needs of the country. When that day arrives I will, if the opportunity presents itself, take the liberty of giving my views in full upon a subject to which I have devoted years of study and investigation—it might have been, perhaps, in vain, but nevertheless with some definite ideas of the extent of the changes that ought to be made—and of the character of the reforms that we ought to accomplish.

OUR CURRENCY MUST BE SAFE AND SOUND.

I have a greater solicitude for a perfectly safe and sound currency than I have for an overabundant currency. The currency of the United States in ordinary times is absolutely ample for the use of the people as a circulating medium. We have to-day nearly three thousand million dollars of currency outstanding, and if we deduct the gold that is in the Treasury for the redemption of greenbacks, and the gold and silver and greenbacks held for the retirement of the national bank notes, and the redemption fund, and the general fund in the Treasury, and the amount of currency held by the various national and State banks, there is still nearly two thousand millions of dollars in actual use as a circulating medium. There is no country in the world that has so large an uncovered currency as we have in the United States. We have a larger uncovered paper currency than Great Britain, France, and Germany combined. Besides this, we must bear in mind that we have over a thousand million dollars in silver and silver certificates and United States notes covered by only $150,000,000 of gold. I look, therefore, with a great degree of distrust upon any plan to expand our note issues and increase our circulating medium. The truth about the situation is that the money in this country is not equitably and fairly distributed, and that it is concentrated at points that dominate the banking interests of the land, and that the people who need the money, and the agricultural sections of the country, and the country banks, and the country towns and mercantile and farming interests, and honest business enterprises are all unable to procure it when the necessity arises for its use, and are all sacrificed to gratify and appease the demands that are concentrated around the financial centers of the country.

We will never have any permanent relief until we strike at the root of the evil and reform our entire banking system from its foundation in the interests of the American people against the special interests who under our present laws exercise a controlling influence with the banks and the Treasury of the United States. So long as I have been in public life I have consistently advocated a system that will make every dollar that goes forth to the people worth a dollar in every Commonwealth of the land, and that is a proposition that I can never yield or compromise upon in the slightest degree.

OPPOSED TO CREDIT CURRENCY AND CENTRAL BANK.

I desire it distinctly understood that, while opposing the present bill, I am not in favor, according to my present convictions, of either a credit currency or an asset currency, and I am opposed to the whole conception of a central bank advocated by the Comptroller of the Currency that shall regulate and control the finances of the country. I want to say one word in passing with reference to the plans that have been suggested of an asset or a credit currency, so that my position may not be misunderstood. Foreign systems have been cited in its favor and Scotch and Canadian banks have been referred to as an example worthy of imitation. There is not the slightest comparison between the conditions and the situation in this country and in those to which continual reference is being made by the advocates of a credit or an asset currency. In Scotland there are only eleven banks with branches, and their aggregate note issues are less than $50,000,000. There are only thirty-five banks in Canada, with numerous branches, and their aggregate note issues never reach the sum of $100,000,000. In this country we have between six and seven thousand national banks, with deposits of over four thousand million dollars and notes already aggregating $600,000,000. I do not believe that with any regard whatever to a stable currency we are in any position to adopt the principle of free interchange of bank-book credits and bank-note credits, and I do not accede to the proposition that every depositor of a bank should have the option of taking his credit at the bank in such form as will best serve his convenience in either a book credit, subject to checks, or a currency credit in bank notes. When the time arrives, if it ever should arrive, for a discussion of this subject, I will give in detail the reasons that influence me in reaching the conclusions that I now present. I only want to be understood now that I am not opposing this bill because I favor an asset currency. I know that other countries, as a rule, have no bond-secured currency such as we have, and that they are using a large amount of credit currency, but I can not think that it would be expedient for us, for the present at least and for a long time to come, to follow their example or to adopt their systems.

When we come to the question of a central bank, I am utterly opposed to it, and let me say to you that there is no parallel whatever between our banking system and the banks under the governments that have the central banking systems. The Bank of France, that has been cited so often in this connection, has a metallic reserve of more than 75 per cent of both its deposit liabilities and notes, more than two-thirds of this reserve being in gold. The Bank of England is required to keep as a reserve against its notes an amount of gold equal to the whole of its notes, except about £17,000,000 issued against Government securities owned by the bank. The Imperial Bank of Germany keeps a reserve in amount equal to 33⅓ per cent of its outstanding issues. In the United States to-day the combined stock of gold of all the banks and trust companies amounts to a little over 5 per cent of their combined liability to individual depositors.

In an admirable address delivered by Mr. Victor Morawitz a short time ago before the Boston Economic Club, he states that any proposal to allow the banks of the United States to expand their note issues and their credits should be scrutinized with the greatest caution, and I agree with him upon this proposition, and if you want to know from me at the present moment what suggested plan has impressed itself upon me with greater favor than any other to remedy our present trouble and extricate us from our present difficulties, I would immediately discard the plan of the American Bankers' Association, and I would take his plan providing for a joint association of national banks for the purpose of enabling each member of the association to issue notes upon the joint credit of the associated banks with a reserve against the notes entirely distinct from the reserve against their deposit liabilities.

OUR RESERVES.

This brings me now to my principal opposition to the bill and to a question that has really been the cause of my taking any part whatever in this debate, and without which I would not, perhaps, have participated at all in the discussion at the present time, because I know that the bill of the Finance Committee will pass, and that this debate upon this occasion is both impracticable and unprofitable. Mr. President, the great trouble is with the reserves. If you were to ask me to find one of the principal causes of the present state of liquidation and depression that we are suffering from, I would unhesitatingly say that it is the law that regulates and controls the reserves. I would dignify this branch of the system if I called it an artifice or a fiction, because it is simply an undisguised and stupendous deception and fraud. The Comptroller of the Currency was bound to make this concession when he was investigating the causes of our present trouble, and while I agree with him in tracing the source of the trouble largely to this cause, I regret that I can not agree with him in the remedy that he proposes. Now, let us look at this reserve system for a moment, because it is as interesting as it is senseless and bewildering. The aggregate liabilities of all the reporting banks and trust companies of the United States amount to over twelve thousand million dollars—four times the entire currency of the United States, and about twelve times the aggregate amount of currency held by all the banks and trust companies deposited with reserve agents under the law. I have already stated that the combined stock of gold against this line of deposits is a little over 5 per cent.

Now, let us see how this reserve scheme practically works in its dishonest and disastrous operation upon the rights of the American people. I shall take the figures of the Comptroller of the Currency. I will take $10,000,000 deposited in the country banks. Of this amount under the law there is only $600,000, that is 6 per cent, of cash in their vaults, and $900,000 deposited with reserve agents. Nine hundred thousand and six hundred thousand make up the 15 per cent upon ten million reserves required by law; three-fifths of which 15 per cent, namely, $900,000, are deposited with reserve agents under the law, and two-fifths of which, namely, $600,000, are retained in the vaults of the bank. Now, when the $900,000 gets into the reserve city banks the law only requires 12½ per cent—that is to say, $112,500—to remain in their vaults. The other 12½ per cent, which makes up the 25 per cent, is deposited in the central reserve banks in New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, and even of this amount the central reserve banks in those cities need only keep the one-fourth of it, namely, $28,125. Is there any such juggling as this practiced in any banking system in any civilized country of the world? Why, sir, the native savages upon the banks of the Senegambian River, with elephants' teeth and the bark of the mulberry tree as a circulating medium, have a better system of finance than this. Has the chairman of the Committee on Finance fully considered what this means in the hour of necessity and of panic when the confidence of the country is gone and the people are hoarding their money? It means by a close calculation that the city banks keep less than 1½ per cent in cash of the country banks' reserve deposits, and the country banks keep only 6 per cent on hand in cash by law. By an accurate mathematical demonstration, made by the Comptroller, you have this situation: That if there is a reduction of $150,000 out of the $10,000,000 deposited in the country banks, or only 1½ per cent, it calls for more cash or reserve money than is kept on hand for the whole $10,000,000 in the reserve banks.

WHY NOT CHANGE THE LAWS FOR THE RESERVES?

You talk to me about moving the crops. Where is the $200,000,000 to come from to move the crops? The country banks have only 6 per cent of their reserve, and the city and central banks have not quite 1½ per cent of their reserves. Who has the money? I suppose that the stock market has it to a large extent. So, gentlemen of the South and West, when you want to move your crops do not apply to the banks, because they have no money, but apply to the New York Stock Exchange for permission to do so. Is it not frightful that this iniquity should continue, condemned by every intelligent financier and honest man in the land? You will understand that in the seasons when money is easy the reserves go to New York as quickly as they can for interest, and then when the hour of contraction comes the New York banks are unable to send the reserves home again, because the money is all loaned out. What has the chairman of the Finance Committee done with section 8 of his original bill? This was the language of section 8 of the original bill:

SEC. 8. That national banking associations located outside of reserve or central reserve cities, which are now required by law to keep a reserve equal to 15 per cent of their deposit liabilities, shall hereafter hold at all times at least two-thirds of such reserve in lawful money.

That was at least a faint effort to change the law in reference to the reserves by providing that the 15 per cent banks—that is to say, the country banks—shall hold at least two-thirds of their reserves in lawful money, instead of two-fifths, as is now required. Why was this section eliminated? What was the reason for it? Who asked for this vital change? This was a small concession at least, but the difference between the provision originally placed by the Senator from Rhode Island in his bill and the provision that exists by law gives you a sum of money, over a hundred million dollars, the difference between the amount in the original bill and the amount in the bill as reported.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly. I should like to know for information. I am not criticising the Senator's bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say that I believe as thoroughly at this moment in the provisions of section 8, to which the Senator has alluded, as I did when it was put into the bill. Opposition was developed to that provision largely among the country banks of the South and West, and as this was an emergency measure, I was very anxious not to encumber it with any provisions that would lead to discussion. I believed that this important question of reserves should be taken up by itself and considered by itself, and the committee therefore thought it desirable that this provision should be left out of the bill, not because they disbelieved in it, but because they believed that the question of reserves should be taken up and considered in a broad and general way, with a view, perhaps, of presenting some system which should be more satisfactory than the existing one.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the chairman of the committee inform us when the committee will take up this very important matter and report a bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. When?

Mr. RAYNER. I will answer the Senator by saying that whenever a tariff bill is passed. They will both come in together. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Let the Senator from Rhode Island answer for himself.

Mr. RAYNER. I will answer that question just now and say that they both will be presented, and, as the tariff bill perhaps will be presented in the interest of protectionists, so the other bill will be presented in the interest of the national banks against the rights of the American people.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. I want to know of the chairman of the Finance Committee who asked for this change? We all admit that this was one of the causes of the trouble.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say, without meaning to disclose any secrets of the committee, that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO], who is now a member of the committee, was one of the strongest opponents of this provision from whom we heard.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I will say that it was unnecessary for the Senator from Rhode Island to have made that statement, as I had already made it to the Senator from Maryland, and I marvel that he should have asked the question of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. RAYNER. I did not understand at all when the Senator from Florida, in a casual conversation this morning outside of the Senate Chamber, said to me that he was in favor of the change, that the Senator from Florida, standing singly and alone as a member of the minority party, had such influence with the Senator from Rhode Island as to cause an important change of this kind to be made. I did not understand that at all. I did not understand for a moment why this change was made. I understood from the Senator from Florida that he was in favor of the change, but I did not understand that the actual influence—perfectly honest influence, of course—which induced the committee to change the original bill was a suggestion of the Senator from Florida alone.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not say that.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, the question of influence was not referred to by the Senator from Maryland, as the RECORD will show. The question he put to the Senator from Rhode Island was, Who proposed and who advocated this change from the original bill as introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island? I stated to him this morning that I moved to strike that provision out of the bill, and I am prepared to give my reasons for my motion and for my action in the matter without taking up the time of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator stated just exactly to me what he states now, and I have no doubt he had the best reasons for his action. I want it distinctly understood that I am not criticising anybody. I know the Senator's reasons for striking it out are just as good as my reasons for trying to keep it in; but it seems strange to me that, upon the motion of a minority member of the committee, without any other reason at all, an important provision of this kind—to me a vital provision of the bill—should have been stricken out.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. RAYNER. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not confine my remarks as to the opposition to this provision to the Senator from Florida. I made no such suggestion or inference. I said there was great opposition to this from country banks, especially from country banks in the South and West, and that the committee let it go out with a view of avoiding a prolonged discussion upon a subject which was not vital to the bill itself.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I wish to say that of course it is well known to the Senate that I could not have stricken anything from that bill without the consent of the members of the committee on the other side of the Chamber; but I want to say that I think the committee acted wisely in striking it out, the opinions of the Senator from Maryland to the contrary notwithstanding, and I am prepared, from a practical standpoint, to show what prompted my action and that it is wise, or, at least, not unwise, in the practical operation of the banking system of this country.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, here we have one of the principal causes of the panic, known to all of us who have examined the subject, and here we have a bill offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that practically admits that the most serious trouble is in a large degree attributable to the reserves, and then we have a new bill reported by the committee that ignores the cause and strikes out the principal remedy against the recurrence of the trouble under which we are suffering. I am not criticising the committee or its distinguished chairman. They have evidently done what to their minds seems best as an emergency measure, but if I may be permitted to say so, with great respect and deference to every member of the committee, I do assert beyond the fear of successful contradiction that in the radical defect and omission that I have pointed out which disfigures this bill as it is now, it works more effectively in the interest of large dividends to the stockholders of national banks than it does in the interests of the American people. My clients upon this floor are the merchants of my city and the laboring and agricultural interests of my State. Consistent with that position, I would not take a single step here that would endanger a single investment in the hands of a stockholder of a national bank. Every honest investment is sacred to me, and the man, I care not who he is, who for a momentary triumph or applause would sacrifice or destroy the legitimate investments of the people of this country is an enemy to society as it is now constituted. But, Mr. President, when I come to a choice between large dividends to stockholders and the rights of the people to market the products of their toil, I must stand by the people. I therefore desire to emphasize the fact that I consider this bill vitally defective, because it does not deal with the subject of bank reserves.

The Senator from Texas, I will say, has a bill here to keep all the reserves in the country banks, and the Senator from Alabama, who has studied this question as thoroughly as any of us from a practical standpoint, has a contemplated amendment of which I am strongly in favor.

Let the country banks keep 10 per cent of their reserves and loan the other 5 per cent to reserve city banks, and out of the 10 per cent that they keep let them invest 5 per cent of the 10 per cent in State or municipal bonds, and whenever they want the money on those bonds under the provisions of this bill they can turn the bonds over to the Treasury of the United States and get the money on them. I think that is a very feasible scheme and one that ought to be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I simply wish to say that under the law the reserve is supposed to be held in the banks and not paid out to the people for any purpose. So, if we have 10 per cent reserve held in the vaults of the country banks instead of 6 per cent, as the law now provides, it would result in contracting their lending capacity 4 per cent on the total amount of their deposits; and I say, when the question of crop movement is brought up here, that it would be impossible for the banks to lend any portion of that reserve to move the crops or for any other purpose. So the minimum amount of reserve that is consistent with the safety of the banks, in my opinion, should be adopted as the amount to be held in the vaults of the banks. That is all I want to say.

Mr. RAYNER. Leaving the question of reserve, because I shall conclude in a few moments, and I have no doubt it will give rise to a great deal of discussion. I am only stating my views. I never come to a conclusion on a matter except after very thorough investigation. I have come to this conclusion, right or wrong. This bill ought to have been reported as introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island. I frankly confess that I do not like the bill in other particulars. I do not like the deposit of railroad bonds; and the reason I do not like this bill is because it simply makes a surface application for the purpose of allaying an organic malady, and does not pretend to cut down deep into the root of the trouble. It may give us an expansion of the currency, and I have no doubt it will, and I do not object to it so far as a deposit of State and municipal securities are concerned, but I do not for a moment favor the artificial method of taxation that is to force the currency back and contract expansion when the money is no longer needed. If I had my way, I would force a contraction of the currency, not by taxation but by increasing the reserves which the banks should hold against their issues. To any student of finance, who has honestly studied the subject, it is a fallacy to tell him that a deposit of securities makes an issue of bank notes sound and safe. Let it be known that a deposit of securities does not create a convertible currency. When I speak of a convertible currency, I mean what any sound financier and economist means who understands the subject, and that is to say a currency that is always redeemable in coin. Every other currency is inconvertible, call it what you will, and secure it how you may.

Do not understand me for a moment as claiming that the reserves have been the sole cause of our trouble. My contention is that they have constituted one of the principal causes of the contraction that has taken place. I do not hold for a moment that it would be proper to keep the whole of the reserves in cash in the vaults of the banks, because I realize that a portion must go to the cities where debts are due and payments are made. What I am charging is that this bill ought to have made a substantial change in the law that relates to the reserves. We must realize that in dealing with this subject of reserves we are speaking of an enormous sum of money—over $700,000,000—and my insistence is that if you intend to preserve a proper equilibrium there must be more money at the ready call of the banks that are not located in the central reserve cities. The suggestion has been made already by an amendment to this bill, and by other amendments that will be offered, that the reserves be divided ratably, say 10 per cent in cash and 5 per cent on deposit, with the power to invest one-half of the 10 per cent in municipal and State securities. I am substantially in favor of such a proposition, because when the banks need the money upon the bonds they can then procure them under the provisions of this bill. Whatever is to be done, or not to be done, I appeal to this body not to pass a bill which peremptorily declines to make any change whatever in this system of reserves and permits this blundering and flagrant injustice to permanently disgrace the statutes of the United States.

CAUSES OF THE PANIC.

When I asserted a moment ago that our present financial distress was not caused entirely by the failure of the banks and people to procure the money that belonged to them, and that they ought to have had, I meant that there were numerous other causes at work to which could be easily traced the anomalous disturbance that has retarded and shocked the prosperity of the country. Unlawful speculation, unlimited gambling in the stock market, overtrading, hazardous business enterprises that did not offer safe security for the loan of money, high and fictitious figures for investments, combinations and consolidations that have benefited the promoters and robbed the people of the land, all working together, destroyed public confidence and helped materially to create a period of depression almost unparalleled in the financial history of this country. And now I say, with great deference and respect, both for the office and for its occupant, that the President of the United States has also, with the best intentions, unconsciously contributed to the misfortunes that have overtaken us. I unite with him in the warfare that he is waging against the violators of the law and the oppressors of the people. He can not be too severe for me in his arraignment of their iniquitous practices. When it comes to the Standard Oil Company and other kindred alliances, no man in this Chamber would go to a greater length than I am willing to go in driving them, if possible, from the face of the Republic. I know that their path has been a path of desolation, I know that they have swept down upon competition like a cormorant upon its prey, and have built their thrones upon the wants of penury and the toil of unrequited labor.

Monopoly is the curse of this country, and I take up my line of march, as I have always done, with the attacking party that will eventually level it to the earth and rescue from its deadly grasp the honest business enterprises of the land and the prostrate rights of the American people. I differ, however, with the President in his method of assault. Malefactors should receive penal punishment, and a whole generation of innocent people ought not to suffer for the sins of their oppressors. One day of imprisonment would do the work better than all the heaviest fines that can be levied upon the institutions they represent. I differ with the President in his remedies, because he has suggested one after another utterly impossible of accomplishment by the Federal Government. Take the child-labor bill that in former messages has received his warmest indorsement. Laying aside its unconstitutionality, which I shall discuss when the occasion presents itself, it has terrified every manufacturing industry in the land, because it provides upon its face that if a single child is employed in a manufactory all the vast products of the establishment produced by adult labor may be excluded from the channels of interstate commerce. Take the capitalization of railroads. I have no objection whatever to this plan, but after the capitalization then what will you do with your innocent stockholders and bondholders? How will you separate and distinguish the watered issue from the lawful capital? What can the Federal Government do with those who have honestly and innocently acquired their investments? It can terrify them, and that is about all that it has done. The President in his last message says that before an investment is made the purchaser should inquire into the management of the road. What a reverie and a dream this is. How is it possible for a trustee, acting for his wards in chancery, or for anyone else, to conduct an investigation into the management of the great trunk-line systems of the United States? The diagnosis of the President is perfectly correct, but in most of the instances he cites his remedies are either unlawful or impracticable. From the violent fervor of his utterances there is an idea running through the public mind that he has come to the conclusion that every man engaged in a large business enterprise is a malefactor, and that every good citizen of the land ought to spend at least one term in the penitentiary. I am with him as a destroyer against every infamous combination that is plundering the American people whenever the law permits it; and now, speaking for myself alone, and I wish I could reecho the voice of my party upon this subject, I am, as I have often asserted in this Chamber, against him whenever he proposes to subvert the rights of the States and invoke the Federal authority—what will not stand the test of judicial decision, proposals that have simply had the effect of intimidating the people and depreciating investments—and I say to you that they have undoubtedly had that effect, because I assert from my own knowledge and experience that men to-day who are in the pursuit of honest and legitimate vocations are possessed of a constant fear that some new volcanic disturbance emanating from the laboratory of the President's prolific mind may take place at any day between the dawn of morning and the setting sun that will make the bulwarks of prosperity quake and tremble and paralyze the business industries of the country.

OUGHT NOT TO BE A PARTY QUESTION.

And now just one word in conclusion. I have arisen for the sole purpose of making a single suggestion upon an isolated branch of the question that is before us. If the time should ever come, as I have said, when our entire system shall be subjected to radical changes, I will, if I occupy any position that will enable me to do so, discuss the topic in all its bearings with the help of such study and research as I have dedicated to its investigation. Let me now, above everything else, anticipate that hour by saying, as I have said before, that I shall never favor any system of currency that is born in dishonor. It must carry with it the proof of its legitimacy and the credentials of its sponsor, the inviolate pledge of the greatest Government of this earth wherever it goes and among whomever it circulates. This question ought never to become a party question. It requires a different forum. I believe that every note that bears, either express or implied, the indorsement of the Treasury should have equal stability in every Commonwealth. I believe in forever striking from the tenets of our political faith the superstitious folly that a nation grows rich in proportion to the amount of worthless money that it can issue, and in place of this idolatry I would plant high upon our altars so that all mankind can read the inscription that we treasure our national integrity as we do our institutions, and that we would sooner fall and perish than dishonor any of the obligations upon which have been imprinted the emblem of the Republic.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I stated that I was in favor of a revision of our system of reserves. I did not mean to be understood by that statement as saying that I thought the present provisions of law, or the practice under them, were responsible in any sense for the crisis through which we have just passed. In order to show what the practice of the banks has been I will read from the Comptroller's report. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] thinks that the country banks should hold in lawful money at least 10 per cent of their deposit liabilities. Now, what is the fact? On the 3d of December, when the country had fairly emerged from the crisis, the country banks held in deposits twenty-four hundred million dollars; not $10,000,000, as the Senator from Maryland suggested, but twenty-four hundred million.

Mr. RAYNER. I used $10,000,000 as an illustration. I said they held about half the deposits of the country, and half the deposits amount to just about the figures the Senator has given. I only used the $10,000,000 as an illustration.

Mr. ALDRICH. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. Of course. You do not suppose for a moment that I thought the country banks held only $10,000,000 when they hold over two thousand million dollars?

Mr. ALDRICH. The banks held, as I say, twenty-four hundred million dollars, and on that twenty-four hundred million dollars they were required to hold $372,000,000 in reserve. Two-thirds of that amount is $248,000,000; that is, if they held the amount of reserve which the Senator from Maryland says they ought to have held and the amount which the amendment which I put in the first bill required them to hold, they would have held $248,000,000. On the 3d of December they had actually in their vaults $246,000,000 in gold and legal-tender notes, so they had at that time within $2,000,000 of the precise amount which the Senator from Maryland says they ought to hold and which they would have been obliged to hold, as I say, under the proposed amendment.

The Senator says that he and I disagree about the figures——

Mr. RAYNER. May I ask how much the country banks have in reserves loaned to central-reserve cities?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what they had actually in their vaults at the time, without regard to what they had in reserve cities. It does not cover the amount which they had on deposit in reserve banks.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not a perfectly fair statement, because from the time the distress occurred in New York the country banks, unable to obtain their reserves in New York, began at once a system of collecting every dollar they could collect and holding it when collected. Therefore, the reserves in the country banks on the day the Senator from Rhode Island instances is not the kind of reserve that the country banks usually keep, and they had it then only because they could not get their money from New York and were compelled to get it from their customers.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not the figures before me. Therefore I will not undertake to answer the Senator from Texas. Undoubtedly it is true that the country banks did strengthen their reserves from October to December, but to what extent I am not sure. My impression is that in the August report they showed substantially as great a reserve as they had in this one.

Mr. BAILEY. My opinion is that up to the 1st of January the banks continued the process of collecting and holding until, I venture to say, the banks throughout the South and the West—and I am practically certain it was true in Texas—had in their vaults and with reserve agents more than 50 per cent of their deposits.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will have the figures here.

The Senator from Maryland says that he and I disagree as to the amount of money outstanding. It is probably my misfortune to disagree with the Senator from Maryland to the extent of $400,000,000 upon a matter of that kind, but in order that there may be no misapprehension about the authority for my figures, I submitted yesterday to the Senate statistics furnished me by the Treasury Department covering this precise point. They are not here yet. They have not yet been printed, but I hold in my hand a proof sheet, and it shows that on the 30th of June, 1907, there was outstanding of all forms of money, exclusive of the banks and the Treasury, sixteen hundred and sixty-six million five hundred thousand dollars, which was the precise amount I stated.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator said the whole currency of the country amounted to two thousand eight hundred million dollars. The Treasury account shows it amounted to three thousand two hundred and eleven million dollars; and I have the specific statement as to the gold coin in the Treasury, silver dollars, subsidiary silver, greenbacks, national-bank notes, etc.

It amounts to $500,000,000 more than the Senator gave. So there must be a mistake on the part of the Treasury Department.

Mr. ALDRICH. The statement I have before me I will read for the information of the Senator from Maryland.

The coin and other money in the United States on June 30, 1907, was three thousand one hundred and fifteen million six hundred thousand dollars; the amount of coin and other money in the Treasury as assets was three hundred and forty-two million six hundred thousand dollars; coin and other money in banks which reported to the Comptroller of the Treasury was one thousand one hundred and six million five hundred thousand dollars; coin and other money not in banks or Treasury, sixteen hundred and sixty-six million five hundred thousand dollars.

That is the report made to me by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr CULBERSON. I invite the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, page 48, in which he states that the total stock of money in the United States on June 30, 1906——

Mr. ALDRICH. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. CULBERSON. Page 48. I am quoting the Comptroller of the Currency. The total stock of money in the United States on June 30, 1906, was $3,069,900,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. Give 1907.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am coming to that. On June 30, 1907, it was $3,115,600,000, being an increase of $45,700,000. The amount of coin and other money not in the Treasury or banks June 30, 1906, was $1,725,900,000. In 1907 the amount was $1,666,500,000, a difference of $59,400,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. Those are the same figures.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, while I have the floor, and it not being quite 2 o'clock, as reference has been made to the bill which I introduced some time ago and which is now pending before the Committee on Finance, with reference to reserves, I desire to state why I introduced the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act every national bank shall have and keep on hand in its vaults the reserve of lawful money provided for by law. All laws and parts of laws which authorize national banks to have and keep part of their reserve with other national banks, and all laws and parts of laws otherwise in conflict herewith, are hereby repealed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I submit to the Senator from Texas that not one dollar of that reserve could be legally used.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not so understand the law. Of course I may be mistaken, but the purpose was to keep that money in the banks to meet emergencies. If it was not to meet an emergency, what was it to be kept there for?

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Texas pardon an interruption?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. It seems to me—certainly my understanding is—that if a bank in the country had a reserve in its vault it could not have used a dollar of that reserve without violating the law. If the Senator is right, it is of the utmost importance certainly that we should understand at this point in the discussion which is the correct view. I appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator mean that that is absolutely necessary?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly not absolutely necessary.

Mr. ALDRICH. The law undoubtedly requires that the reserve shall be maintained, and if the bank fails to maintain it, the Comptroller can take possession of the bank.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is not my understanding as to deposits. Of course I may be mistaken about it, but I was saying that the purpose in the bill I have introduced was to keep on hand a reserve in the banks in the interior for the purpose of meeting extraordinary runs which may be made upon the banks by depositors.

What is the one hundred and fifty million gold reserve in the Treasury vaults for? It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury is required to keep that amount of gold in the Treasury, but when a gold obligation is presented to him he is required to pay it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is for a specific purpose.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I understand that.

Mr. TELLER. And it is not subject to the control of the Treasury except for the redemption of greenbacks.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that, Mr. President, but I was only illustrating the object of a reserve. It is to meet an extraordinary occasion that may arise. The idea of the bank reserve is that all the country banks should keep on hand in cash 15 per cent of their deposits, as it would in all probability meet any demand which might be made upon them by their depositors.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that the banking law fully bears out his statement that the reserve may be used temporarily for purposes of meeting unexpected conditions arising in the bank. I refer to the national banking act as it is issued by the Comptroller of the Currency during this year, page 24, section 95. It provides that where the reserve is found unexpectedly decreased below the amount fixed by law the Comptroller may give notice and require it to be made good within thirty days. That contemplates that it may be brought down by extraordinary circumstances.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill, and upon which I wish to submit some remarks at the convenience of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I had not intended to have anything to say in reference to the pending financial bill this morning. I was drawn into it unwittingly by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. While I have no disposition to comment on the chairman of the Finance Committee, who took occasion to state to the Senate the attitude of certain members of the committee on this bill, I am unwilling, in view of the nature of some of the Senator's remarks, to have them go to the country without a word of reply from me.

The Senator from Maryland said that his constituents were the business men, the merchants of his State, and further made a statement which implied that those who favored the striking out of the section of the bill which he wished retained had done so in the interest of dividends to the stockholders of national banks.

Mr. President, I represent as honest a constituency on this floor, as business-like a constituency, as intelligent and upright a constituency as does the Senator from Maryland or any other Senator. I have no disposition to serve the national banks. On the contrary, I think that the national banks should be required in return for what they get from the Government to pay interest on the Government deposits; but I am unwilling to see them handicapped in any way by such a provision as the Senator from Maryland would write in this bill.

I have a statement before me which shows that the total deposits in national banks of the United States subject to reserve requirements on December 3, 1907, amounted to $4,906,684,057. If the percentage of reserves, as suggested by the Senator from Maryland, is increased from 6 to 10 per cent and if it were applicable to the entire amount of deposits in the national banks, it would result in a contraction of the lending capacity of the banks of nearly $200,000,000.

We are not here, as I understand, to inflate the currency. There is no disposition on the part of anybody I have heard of to inflate the currency. The measure brought into the Senate, while I do not agree with it in many particulars, was intended purely as an emergency measure, to be used only at such times as conditions might absolutely demand it.

There is a clause in the very first part of the bill which makes this emergency provision available to the banks which have taken out 50 per cent of their capital in circulation. I intend to move at the proper time that that be increased to 70 per cent, because I hold that the national banks should be required to furnish the money to the country that the business of the country absolutely needs.

Since the chairman has disclosed the proceedings of the committee, I may say that I contended in the committee that a hundred per cent of the capital stock should be taken out in circulation. When I was confronted by the fact that there were not United States bonds enough outstanding to enable them to do that on a United States bond-secured currency I reduced the percentage to 70 per cent, which I shall propose in the Senate at the proper time as an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing to admit that I was betrayed into doing something which I ought not to have done and stated the views presented in committee, but the Senator from Maryland was so pointed in his question that I was led to suggest that the Senator from Florida had occupied a different position from what the Senator did on this subject. I am quite sure that I was wrong in making the suggestion which I did, and I apologize to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. All right, Mr. President. I had no objection to the Senator from Maryland or the people of the country knowing what my attitude was in the committee, as is shown by the fact that I told the Senator what it was this morning, and I was therefore surprised that he should have asked the question on the floor of the Senate.

So, Mr. President, I am unwilling to have it go to the country on the statement of the Senator from Maryland, by implication or otherwise, that I am here representing any national bank or the stockholders of any national bank. I am here to see, as far as I can, that the banks live up to the law, and I am here to put upon the banks such conditions and requirements as will compel them under the law to furnish to the country the currency that is needed to do the business of the country.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] said that he would desire to address the Senate upon the amendment he submitted. Is it his pleasure to go on to-day?

Mr. OWEN. It is not my wish to go on to-day, but in three or four days I will be prepared to speak.

Mr. ALDRICH. If there is no other Senator who desires to speak, I suggest that we allow the bill to go over until to-morrow and take it up at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to submit to the Senate while there is, comparatively, a full attendance that if we could have probably four or five hours for the consideration of the unfinished business we would be able to get it out of the way and leave the Senate unencumbered by something which does not seem to attract very much attention, at least as indicated by the attendance. I thought, perhaps, we might arrive at some understanding by which it would be considered time well spent in the interest of prompt procedure along other lines that that bill should be taken up and the consideration of it completed.

I do not desire to delay or hinder the consideration of the pending bill. Of course, I cheerfully lay aside the unfinished business for the consideration of the financial measure, which is deemed to be of very great importance, and is; but if by general consent of the Senate we could proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business until it is finished it would then relieve the situation. I think, perhaps—probably in one session—with an attendance that would enable us to give it thorough consideration and come to a vote, we would be able to dispose of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall not bring to the attention of the Senate again to-day the financial bill. So the Senator from Idaho has four or five hours now at his disposal.

REVISION OF THE PENAL LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the Senator from Idaho, who has the bill in charge, asks that we may agree to continue its consideration until it is disposed of.

Mr. HEYBURN. The time having arrived, pending the consideration of my suggestion, and the bill being now before the Senate, it is entirely probable that before adjournment to-day we may be able to dispose of it.

Mr. TELLER. If we do that, it is all right, but I am not willing to agree to take up the bill to the exclusion of everything else and proceed with it until it is concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not intend to ask that it be taken up to the exclusion of everything else, but that it be given as much time for consideration as possible.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The sections passed over have been read to the end of section 114 on page 56.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to ask the Senate to recur to a section not disposed of, but I notice that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is not present. Perhaps he is conveniently at hand. I ask that we proceed with the consideration of section 115.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read section 115.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 115. [Whoever, being elected a Senator, Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner from any Territory of the United States, shall, after his election and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, or being the head of a Department or other officer or clerk in the employ of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatever for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, before any Department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than two years; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.]

Mr. BORAH. I desire to offer an amendment at this time. I move to insert the word "court," in line 13 of the original bill, after the word "Department."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 57, line 24, after the words "before any Department," insert the word "court," so as to read, "before any Department, court, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I do not see any necessity for an amendment precluding Senators and Members from practicing in the courts of the United States. If that is the purpose of it, I am against it.

Mr. BORAH. This section purports to preclude a Senator or Representative in Congress from practicing where the United States Government is interested before a Department, or court-martial, or any other part of the Government. The same reason should apply with reference to practicing in United States courts where the Government is interested as applies to any other Department. If there is any occasion for the statute at all, it should apply with reference to the courts the same as to courts-martial or a Department or any other part of the Government.

I do not contend that there is any great necessity for the statute as a law, but there is certainly no reason which can be suggested for the enforcement of the law with reference to a court where the Government is interested in the proposition.

Mr. TELLER. There are various cases in which the Government is not financially interested in which there can be no reason why such a man should not make a fee if he chooses. I do not want to enlarge the law. It is a repetition of the act of 1864, as I recollect. The Government may be in a case in court only nominally, and yet the Government would have an interest in it that would make the Government a party, I suppose, within the meaning of the law.

This is an attempt to prevent what had grown up to be somewhat of an evil immediately after the war. There was some scandal about the system of doing business. We had a case where a military officer holding a high office under the Government went into a court-martial with his regimentals on, and as a paid attorney, appeared before the court-martial. That is one of the cases which attracted the attention of the public at the time.

Up to 1864 there never had been a law on this subject. Some who were elected to Congress practiced law and took fees in cases where the Government was directly interested. Most did not do it, but some of the best men we had in the public service were known to take fees in suits against the Government of the United States.

If any Senator will take the debates of 1864, when this act was passed, he will discover that it was hotly contested by some of the best men who were ever in the Senate. The act is defective in principle, because it does not make it an offense for a man to appear in a case where the United States is interested, but makes it an offense for him to take pay for it. The offense should consist in appearing at all. I think ordinarily a man should not appear in a case where it is possible that the Government should have any interest financially, or I might say morally. Yet the section is undoubtedly full enough to cover all cases, and I do not see why we should include in it the courts.

Mr. President, I do not care much whether you put "court" in the section or not. I want to say what I have said before, that I do not believe when the act was passed it was intended that when the Government had any interest other than financial there should be any prohibition of a Senator or a Member from appearing in the case. The debates will show that it was confined entirely at the time to the financial interest the Government might have in the transaction, and it was intended to apply to no other cases. It is almost impossible to say that the Government is not interested in almost everything that concerns the morals and health of the people of the United States. It has been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, by a divided court, to mean more than anybody supposed the act meant when it was passed.

If it could be confined simply to the interest of the Government, I think it would be well enough to put "court" in, just as well as "Department," although the primary purpose was that a Senator or Member should not go before a Department when the Department depended largely upon the good will of the Senate or the House for its usual appropriations, and he was supposed to exercise some influence that he ought not to exert.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am not in favor of the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Idaho. I can see very good reasons for the law as it is now found in the statute books, which, in effect, forbids any Senator or Member of Congress from appearing for compensation before any Department or bureau or officer of the Government, because the relations of a Senator or Representative to the Departments is of such a peculiar and intimate character that he may have peculiar influences in matters before a Department or before an officer. But I do not think that any of those reasons obtain in practice before a court.

If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Idaho should be adopted, it would forbid a Member of Congress from defending any person charged with a criminal offense before any court of the United States. Of course in a case of that kind his influence over the court would be no greater than that of any other attorney practicing at the bar.

I think it is altogether a matter of taste. My opinion about it is that a Senator or Representative ought not to appear before a court in any case in which the United States is involved. Since I have been a member of this body I have always declined to appear in any such cases, and I would not take such a case; but to make a breach of taste a criminal offense, punishable by imprisonment, as this law provides, not to exceed two years, and by a fine of $10,000, it seems to me is going altogether too far. I am not in favor of any such amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it occurs to me, as I said a moment ago, that the same reason which applies with reference to a Department must necessarily apply with reference to a court. It can not be said, I think, with any degree of assurance, that the influence in the Department would be any greater than that which might obtain with reference to certain features of the case if it were before a court.

The law here provides a very heavy penalty. It provides that in any—

> Claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, before any Department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than two years.

It is a well-known fact, and a most important fact, that those things in which the Government is most concerned very often pass from the halls of legislation directly to the court, and in that forum are settled.

The fact suggested by the Senator from Utah, that he would not accept a fee nor appear under such conditions, is a primary reason why it should be inhibited as an entirety because the practice is wrong. I submit that those who are here for the purpose of legislating must stand in such a position that they are not disqualified in any respect whatever, either by previous employment or by anticipated employment, with reference to those matters in which the Government of the United States is concerned. It can not be said that it applies to a Department and would not apply to a court, because the courts are human just the same as the Departments.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would direct the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the language preceding the proposed amendment. It is very broad. It says that no person, naming the class—

> Shall, directly or indirectly, receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatever for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested.

I have omitted the words with reference to the criminal proceedings.

It will be evident that the law as it exists is broad enough to cover proceedings in the Departments other than criminal matters. If the word "court" is inserted, then Members of Congress would be prohibited from appearing as attorneys in controversies under the provisions of section 2326 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which is the section providing for contests in support of adverse claims filed against applications for mining patents. The United States Supreme Court in the case of Gwillian v. Donnellan and in subsequent decisions held in effect that since the passage of the act of 1882—March 3, I think—the United States was a party to litigation involving the question as to who was entitled to a patent or as to whether any party was entitled to a patent. The act of Congress to which I referred provides that in the event neither party shows himself to be entitled to a patent the jury shall so find, and judgment shall be entered accordingly. In construing that statute the United States Supreme Court held that the Government of the United States was a party to all suits brought under the provisions of section 2326 of the Revised Statutes.

I cite that as one of the instances of a class of cases where the United States is interested within the meaning of the language used in this section. There would be no occasion for amending the proposed law by inserting the word "court" if by such an amendment you would preclude Members of Congress who happen to be attorneys and who practice law, when their duties will permit them to engage in doing so, from taking cases of that kind. There are a number of classes of such cases other than the ones to which I have directed attention. If the statute is to be amended by prohibiting Members of Congress from appearing as attorneys in cases in which the United States is interested, then it should provide explicitly, so as to limit the right to the class of cases to which I have referred. It would perhaps be appropriate to provide that no Member of Congress should appear as an attorney in a court of the United States against the Government of the United States in any case in which the Government has a real interest; but to provide that in every case in which the Government is directly or indirectly interested, without defining the character of the interest, as to whether or not it be such an interest as I have referred to or whether it be the interest in maintaining the law, would seem to me to be too wide a restriction. I merely call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the effect of the amendment as it would apply to these civil actions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, just a word further in regard to this matter. In the first place, there are many reasons suggested for the law as it now stands. As has been suggested, one of the strong reasons is the influence which is supposed to accompany a man who occupies a position in this body or in the House of Representatives. That is one of the reasons which has been suggested from time to time in support of the law as it stands without the amendment.

Now, with reference to the matter which has been suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], it does not occur to my mind as any reason obtaining with reference to this particular kind of litigation which might not arise with reference to any other kind of litigation.

But there is another side to the controversy aside from that of the interest of the Government, and that is the man who is contending in litigation against the Government. I maintain that the position of a United States Senator should not be used in the courts or elsewhere or in any other way than that of a legislator, and that he ought not to appear before any Department or court, because of the influence or because of the effect that his appearance there might have upon those contending against him. The same rule precisely applies with reference to the courts and the Departments in that respect. If the statute is too broad with reference to any particular matter, let it be limited.

If the law were in its first enactment, there might be much said against its enactment as a law at all; but in view of the fact that the wisdom of the legislators heretofore has seen fit to crystallize it into a statute, for the very reason which I have suggested and for the single reason that it applies to the Departments, it should also apply to the courts of the United States, because the complaint is being made, and it is abroad in the land, that these influences are used in the courts for the purpose of accomplishing and doing what ought not to be done.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I should like to have the pending amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAMBLE in the chair). The amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 115, on page 57, line 24, after the word "department," it is proposed to insert the word "court," so that if amended the section will read:

> SEC. 115. [Whoever, being elected a Senator, Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner from any Territory of the United States, shall, after his election and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, or being the head of a department, or other officer or clerk in the employ of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatever for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, before any department, court, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than two years; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.]

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this provision will undoubtedly include every civil case. In the mining regions there are large numbers of controversies between miners, where the Government is a nominal party, but having no interest whatever in them. There is a controversy, we will say, between two men as to a patent. The patent may have issued to the wrong person; it is immaterial to the Government whether John Smith or Richard Jones gets the patent; but a suit is brought to determine which one of the parties is entitled to the patent, and the Government must be a party to the suit. This provision would cut out from appearing in the case any lawyer who happened to be a Member of the House of Representatives or a Senator.

Mr. President, I am not now in the practice of the law, and have not been for a good many years; but I have seen many cases, and have been connected with cases, which would fall within this rule; and if I had been practicing after I had been elected a Senator there would have been no impropriety whatever in my taking a fee, because the Government would lose nothing whichever way the case might be decided. I think that this is a pretty strict law as it is, but it should not be extended so as to apply to such cases as these.

I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho that the courts are so weak or wicked, whichever he may call it, that the presence of a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives is going to secure a judgment. That, I think, is an unwarranted reflection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Colorado say that the heads of Departments are weak and are amenable to such influences?

Mr. TELLER. I do not believe that this provision had any application, or ever ought to have had any application, to the heads of Departments, but we are not proposing to change it. I do say, however, Mr. President, that it is a reflection upon the courts at least to say that a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives appearing before them could secure a verdict or a decision which he would not get if he did not happen to be a Senator or Representative.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, before he takes his seat, I should be glad to ask if that amendment were adopted could a Member of Congress defend an accused man in a United States court in a criminal case? Is it not the fact that the United States is a party to every criminal case in a Federal court; and, therefore, would a Member of Congress be permitted to practice law to any extent under the provisions of this bill, especially in criminal cases?

Mr. TELLER. Of course it would include every case where the Government was a party, whether really or nominally. I think Senators who are interested in this matter would do well to examine the debate which took place when the original law was enacted and read the speech then made by Senator John P. Hale against the bill. I doubt whether there was a better man morally in the Senate than John P. Hale. In that speech he made a very vigorous and able remonstrance against the bill at that time. I do not see any need, Mr. President, for now extending its provisions.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I do not believe that the fact of a lawyer being a Senator or Representative in Congress will have any undue weight with the courts. I do not believe because there is a provision of law that Senators and Representatives in Congress shall not be permitted to practice before the Departments, or to receive compensation for any influence they may exert in behalf of their constituents before the Departments, that is any reason why Senators and Representatives should be forbidden to practice before the courts of the country where the United States Government is a party. But if it be a fact that a Senator or a Representative does exercise undue power and influence over the courts, it were better to have that power and influence exercised in behalf of a defendant than to have it exercised in behalf of the Government in the prosecution of the defendant.

Many men are dragged before the courts, sir, who are entirely innocent of the charge preferred against them by the indictment. They are carried away from home to a county other than the one in which they live; they are strangers, except in their immediate vicinage, and they are tried when they have no means of securing the attendance of witnesses in their behalf; they have scanty means to employ an attorney, and if it may be that the powerful influence of a Senator or Representative, as depicted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], may be brought by the Government against such a defendant, surely even-handed justice should permit this influence to be brought in the defense of the defendant. He is presumed to be innocent until his guilt appears by the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court.

As has been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], miners are brought before the courts on charges, and they are to be tried; farmers are brought before the courts on charges when they are indicted, and when they are perfectly innocent, and they are to be tried. What reason can be given for the permission that this influence, whether it be real or imaginary, which a Senator or a Representative in Congress exercises over a court should be exercised in behalf of the Government for oppression and not in behalf of the defendant for his defense? There could be no reason for permitting a Senator or Representative to prosecute a defendant in court that is not a good reason for permitting that defendant to employ an attorney, though Representative or Senator he may be, to defend him in the same court.

I do not believe, as I said at the outset, there is any undue exercise of influence over the court by reason of the fact that a lawyer who appears before it is a Senator or a Representative. It sometimes happens that a lawyer of great power of intellect and profound learning in the lore of his profession is able, by the mere fact of his name, to exercise an influence upon courts and juries that no Senator, because of the name of Senator or Representative, because of the name of Representative, could exercise upon juries or upon courts.

Courts have respect for the opinions of lawyers who practice before them higher than that which they have for the opinions of Senators and Representatives. The fact is that the man who is engaged constantly at the bar in the practice of his profession is supposed by the courts, and properly so, to be better up on the practice than Representatives and Senators who are supposed to give their attention to legislative matters. The Senator himself will recognize the proposition that a lawyer is supposed to be a better lawyer, a better practitioner, with more influence with courts and juries, before he has been in the Senate or the House of Representatives any considerable time than he is afterwards. I submit, sir, that this section ought to be passed as it is, without amendment, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator seems to read the section differently from what I do. It does not permit a man to appear in a case where the United States Government is a party any more to prosecute than it does to defend, or vice versa. If a man should be arrested under such conditions as have been so vividly pointed out by the Senator, and it appears that he can not have a fair trial without the influence of a Senator, there is no reason in the world why his Senator should not appear and defend him if he does not want to accept any pay for it. He can appear for the purpose of protecting his client if he does not accept any compensation; and I think those who drew this bill acted very wisely in condemning the acceptance of compensation in such cases, because he will not likely appear very often unless he is paid.

So far as the question of influence upon the court is concerned, I do not care to discuss that any further than to say that we must admit that the same rule which applies with reference to the Departments must necessarily apply with reference to the courts. It appears that once in a while the courts get into politics, become interested in such questions, and are more or less concerned with reference to results, as we all know. We have had some experience along those lines. I have not been in the Senate long enough to know whether a man ceases to be a lawyer after he gets here, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, but I know a great many of them practice after they get here who did not practice before.

Mr. McLAURIN. Now, let us see whether it will apply to the Government of the United States—

Any compensation whatever for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another—

That is, whether the services are to be rendered by himself or by another. That would not include the United States. A Senator could be employed under that provision for the purpose of representing the United States, because he would not then be rendering any service to any person.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that would not preclude a Senator from appearing in defense of his client if he desired to do so without compensation, as I said.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will answer that part of it in a moment. But that cuts out the proposition of the Senator that it would preclude a Senator or Representative from practising in a court in behalf of the Government. It would not shut him out from prosecuting in a court, as the Senator must see by reading this provision.

Now, as to volunteering or rendering service to a client. Since I have been a United States Senator I have not appeared for compensation in the defense of any man indicted in the Federal courts so far as I now recall, but I have volunteered my services to defend in United States court without fee. I defended men in the Federal court in a case where there were several hundred of them indicted who were, as I thought and think now, innocent. They belonged to a lawful organization, the Farmers' Union, which was then in its infancy in the State of Mississippi.

Although the union was a lawful order, organized for a lawful aim, four or five men who were members of the organization were charged with committing an offense, and thereupon all the members of the union in the two counties were indicted on the ground that everybody who belongs to an illegal organization or an organization organized for any illegal purpose is liable for the acts of all the others, a false premise in this case. They were not organized for any unlawful or lawless purpose. The purpose of their organization was lawful, but a detective had been down among them—and like detectives generally, who think they must bring back game in their bags or be considered not to have earned their money—this detective managed to have these men indicted. I appeared for them voluntarily, without any fee, but there could have been no reason why any Senator or Representative in Congress should not have been permitted to defend them for a fee. Why should there be a law that would prevent a Senator or Representative who is a lawyer from defending one of those men, but would permit a Senator or Representative to use his influence—if there is any influence unduly used—before the court against them and for the prosecution?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose one of those farmers had had a matter before a Department which was of prime concern to him and of much interest to him and he had offered to employ you, is there any reason why you should not have been employed?

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes, sir; a very good reason.

Mr. BORAH. What is it?

Mr. McLAURIN. Because when you are before the Departments you are representing your constituents in an official capacity; you are performing an official act for them. It is part of a Senator's duty to represent them before the Departments. But when he represents them in a court of justice he is not representing them as an official. There is a vast difference. The Senator can go up and perform a function before the Departments that a private citizen can not. Why? Not because there is any corruption in the Department, not because there is any weakness in the Department, but from the fact that that Department understands that the Senator is before them as an official of the United States and that his act is an official act. That is the reason Senators should not be permitted to practice for compensation before the Departments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that a Senator always represents a party in an official capacity before the Departments?

Mr. McLAURIN. If he is acting as an official, he does—if he is acting as Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, if he is acting as an official; but there are many instances in which when he goes there he is not acting as an official at all.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not think so.

Mr. BORAH. I apprehend that it would not be necessary to have any law to prohibit a Senator from going before the Departments and taking compensation for his work when he was acting officially. Certainly, this law is not designed for the purpose of preventing a Member of Congress from taking compensation when he is acting officially before a Department.

Mr. McLAURIN. When the Senator goes before a Department with a recommendation for the appointment of an official he is doing that as a Senator; when the Senator goes there for the purpose of looking into some land matter for one of his constituents he is representing his constituent. He is doing that as a Senator. What act is it that the Senator can go before a Department and perform which is not an official act?

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator, is there not an important distinction between practicing before a Department and a court?

Mr. McLAURIN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLAY. Just one moment, with the Senator's permission——

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Take the Post-Office Department. We appropriate $200,000,000 a year to run it. That Department gets its very life from Congress. That Department makes its recommendations to Congress. It is constantly asking favors of Congress. Consequently, a Member of Congress will have greater influence with the Department than a private citizen. I can see why a Member of Congress would think it improper to practice before the Departments regardless of explicit law. The Departments of the Government get their life from Congress; they get the money to support them from Congress. But when you come to the courts, the courts are under no obligation to Congress. Their judges hold their offices for life, with fixed salaries. There is quite a distinction between the two, and I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] is eminently correct.

Mr. McLAURIN. I thank the Senator from Georgia for that statement, because every word of it is perfectly sound. The difference between going before the Departments for the purpose of representing not a client, but a constituent, and going before a court for the purpose of representing a client is just as wide as distance.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. How would it be with reference to a court-martial?

Mr. McLAURIN. There is a provision here against their appearing before a court-martial.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. What difference is there between that and a court?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not know about that. I do not see any difference, so far as I am concerned, but it is in here. I did not put it in here. I am not responsible for it. The Senator need not "shake his gory locks at me."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not my locks which the Senator need be afraid of, but the law.

Mr. McLAURIN. I am not afraid of the law. The law protects me.

Mr. BORAH. I am not censuring the Senator from Mississippi or any other Senator for putting this provision in. I am simply saying that the reason for the law's existence now applies equally to its extension to the courts.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then would the Senator have the word "court-martial" stricken out?

Mr. BORAH. No, sir; I would have the word "court" put in, as I suggested.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], the Post-Office Department is a Department that gets its appropriations from Congress. The Post-Office Department relies a great deal upon Senators and Representatives to make recommendations for appointments in the different States and districts, and, relying upon them, it would be a great absurdity to say when the Post-Office Department calls upon a Senator or Representative, or permits him to come without being called upon, to recommend a man for office, that Senator or Representative should be permitted to receive compensation for that; to sell his influence, to sell his official action, in other words, for money. In this commercial age that might be considered by some as good business, but I do not think the Senate of the United States so considers it. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Idaho will be promptly voted down.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the amendment go over for to-day. I desire to prepare a more extensive one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks that the pending amendment may lie over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to its going over.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to voting on the amendment, but the Senator from Idaho asks that it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie over. The next section passed over will be read.

The Secretary read the next section passed over, as follows:

SEC. 116. [Whoever, being elected a Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner from any Territory of the United States, shall, after his election and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement made or entered into in behalf of the United States by any officer or person authorized to make contracts on its behalf, shall be fined not more than $3,000. All contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be void, and whenever any sum of money is advanced by the United States in consideration of any such contract or agreement it shall forthwith be repaid; and in case of failure or refusal to repay the same, when demanded by the proper officer of the Department under whose authority such contract or agreement shall have been made or entered into, suit shall at once be brought against the person so failing or refusing and his sureties for the recovery of the money so advanced.]

Mr. HEYBURN. The existing law provides for an arbitrary fine of $3,000. The court is given no option whatever. The committee has reported this section with an amendment, inserting the words "not more than," so as to read "not more than $3,000." I think outside of that there is no material change.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 117. [Whoever, being an officer of the United States, shall on behalf of the United States, directly or indirectly make or enter into any contract, bargain, or agreement, in writing or otherwise, with any Member of or Delegate to Congress, or any Resident Commissioner from any Territory of the United States, after his election as such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner, and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, shall be fined not more than $3,000.] (R. S., s. 3742.)

SEC. 118. Nothing contained in the two preceding sections shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any contract or agreement made or entered into, or accepted, by any incorporated company, where such contract or agreement is made for the general benefit of such incorporation or company; nor to the purchase or sale of bills of exchange or other property by any Member of or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner, where the same are ready for delivery, and payment therefor is made, at the time of making or entering into the contract or agreement.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I stated a week or two ago that I desired to offer an amendment to the bill covering the giving out of information by an officer of any Department prior to its official deliverance by the Department, in so far as it might affect market values of agricultural products, the object being to cover the case which arose in the Department of Agriculture with reference to the cotton yield.

In another body on the 21st of January an amendment known as section 119a was adopted having this purpose in view, and I offer it here now, and trust that the Senator in charge of the bill may see fit to allow it to be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When the Senator from Texas offered his amendment before, he suggested that it come in after section 119, and it was suggested by the Senator from Idaho, I think, that it would better come in at the end of the chapter, after section 124, to which I understood the Senator to assent.

Mr. CULBERSON. The statement of the Senator from Utah is entirely correct. Probably I ought to have stated a while ago that I offered it to be inserted at this place, because a similar amendment has been adopted in another body at this point as section 119a.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, after line 14, add, as a new section, the following:

SEC. 119a. Whoever, being an officer or employee of the United States or a person acting for or on behalf of the United States in any capacity under or by virtue of the authority of any Department or office thereof, and while holding such office, employment, or position shall, by virtue of the office, employment, or position held by him, become possessed of any information which might exert an influence upon or affect the market value of any product of the soil grown within the United States, which information is by law or by the rules of the Department or office required to be withheld from publication until a fixed time, and shall willfully impart, directly or indirectly, such information, or any part thereof, to any person not entitled under the law or the rules of the Department or office to receive the same; or shall, before such information is made public through regular official channels, directly or indirectly speculate in any such product respecting which he has thus become possessed of such information, by buying or selling the same in any quantity, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this is a modification of existing law, and while I presume it is in order to offer such an amendment, it is contrary to the purpose of the Codification Commission and contrary to the universal rule of codification. It may be a very good amendment; the principle may be very good, and possibly it ought to be adopted, but if it is adopted it should be in a separate bill.

If we commence putting in the bill all the things that ought to go in we will not get through with this bill at the present session. There are a great many things that ought to go in, but they will be left out, undoubtedly, unless we commence a general amendment of the laws. If we do, then everything will go on. If the committee allow these things to go on now we will be at it indefinitely. I am not opposed to the principle of the Senator's amendment. I do not know about the phraseology of it, but the idea that Government officials shall maintain secrecy where they are charged with secrecy is all right. That is all there is about it. That is what I think they should do. But I do not think we should go beyond a mere revision of the laws as they now exist. The purpose is to put the statutes now existing in proper form and not to enact a lot of new ones.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado is directly in line with the policy that was adopted and has been thus far pursued by the committee, to treat this work as a revision of existing law and not as the enactment of new statutes, for the very good reason that any proposition of original legislation in Congress should go to the standing committees of Congress for consideration. The joint committee is not invested with power to consider new legislation.

I agree with the Senator from Texas that this provision should be incorporated into the laws of the United States, but I think it should go in through the ordinary channels of legislation. I do not believe there would be any serious objection to the enactment of such a law if it were introduced and sent to the proper committee. If we once open the door to new suggestions of legislation, it will be difficult to say whether we can close it or not. There are before me on the desk a great many propositions for the enactment of new laws in connection with the revision and codification of existing law, and to yield to them is rather a dangerous proceeding and might be taken as a precedent which would give us trouble.

The purpose of the amendment commends itself to me and would commend itself unhesitatingly to Congress, and would be enacted without any difficulty, because it is obviously in the interest of confining the officers of the Government to the performance of their strict duty, and providing that they shall not take advantage of official knowledge for the purpose of personal gain either to themselves or their friends. I had hoped the Senator from Texas would not press this amendment, because it is not germane to the law upon which it is sought to be engrafted. We are dealing in sections 119 and 120 with the restrictions upon Members of Congress. Now, this does not propose to restrict Members of Congress, but to restrict the clerical and other officer or employees in the administrative branch of the Government, and if it were to be considered at all it seems to me it ought not to be at this place.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will say to the Senator that I am not a stickler and will not be as to where the amendment shall appear in the bill. If he is willing to accept it as an independent section, I shall be glad to offer it as such.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say if it is to be considered and adopted at all, it should go in among those provisions affecting executive or administrative officers and not as a part of the chapter pertaining to legislative officers.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have stated that I offered it here simply because another body, where the same measure is pending, has adopted it as section 119a.

I will state, if the Senator will permit me, that this provision in the form of a bill has already passed the Senate and passed the House of Representatives. But it became involved in some matter of conference and never became a law. The measure I propose here is, in a somewhat modified form, not as strong as it was then, that which passed the two Houses. I hope the Senator will agree to the suggestion I made, that the committee accept this amendment, because the bill contains a great deal of new law, absolutely new law, Mr. President, and as I understand, creating new offenses against the United States, changing the penalty, etc. The head note reads:

Existing law is printed in roman; amendments and new sections are printed in italics; sections which have been redrafted or from which any material matter has been omitted, or which have been formed by combining different sections or provisions of existing law are printed in brackets.

Mr. President, this is an important matter. Here is the Department of Agriculture of the United States engaged in securing statistics of the production of cotton in the Southern States. An officer or employee of that Department, taking advantage of his confidential relation to the Department, sold the information to speculators in New York City and created great disturbance in the market. It occurs to me, when we are allowing other amendments to this bill creating new offenses against the United States, the agricultural interest ought to be protected in the particular which we ask here without any extended argument to have it done. I submit to the Senator that he ought to accept this amendment, it having already passed another House in the consideration of this measure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not inclined to be persistent in opposing the insertion of the amendment, but I would suggest to the Senator from Texas that if we are to adopt it it should be as an independent section and under the proper head or within the proper chapter.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am perfectly willing to accept that suggestion.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will withhold it until we come to those chapters where it would be appropriate as a new section, I am not at all disposed to object to it, because I approve the principle of the legislation.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well; I accept the suggestion of the Senator and will offer it as an independent section at another place in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that it will be more proper to offer it when we come to treat of offenses by employees of the administrative department of the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas withdraws his amendment. The next passed over section will be stated.

The Secretary read section 125, as follows:

SEC. 125. [Whoever having taken an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly or that any written testimony, declaration, deposition, or certificate by him subscribed, is true, shall willfully and contrary to such oath state or subscribe any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, and shall be fined not more than $2,000 and imprisoned not more than five years.]

Mr. BACON. Is there any other change in the section from existing law than as to the provision in existing law which disqualifies the party thus convicted of the right thereafter to give testimony in court?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the only change made in existing law. The change consists in the omission of the provision——

Mr. BACON. The idea being that a party should still be a competent witness, and the fact of his having been previously convicted should go to his credibility. It might be necessary to specify that that fact might be given in evidence. It could not be given in evidence by the prosecution unless the defendant himself put his character in issue, and yet the prosecution ought to have the opportunity to prove that fact, in order that it might go to his credibility. It is a rule in criminal law and practice that no evidence can be given against the character of an accused unless the accused himself puts his character in issue by offering to prove his good character. Then the prosecution is at liberty to prove what it can against the character of the accused. But no man when put upon trial can be prejudiced on that trial by having evidence given by the prosecution of his bad character. If we are going to make the change—and I think the change has in it the merit of a correct purpose—it seems to me, in order that the purpose may be effected, that the fact of his prior conviction may go to his credibility and not to his disqualification, it is necessary that there should be an express provision of law that in the prosecution the fact of the conviction could be put in evidence.

I think it would be very well, instead of entirely eliminating that feature from the law as it now exists, to modify it to the extent of simply permitting such proof to be made as would enable the fact of his prior conviction of perjury to go to his credibility.

Mr. HEYBURN. The proposed change in existing law puts the practice in the Federal courts upon the same plane as it is now in nearly all, and I think I may safely say all, the States. It is always permitted under existing law in the States, which is as this section would be with that provision stricken out, to ask a witness whether or not he has been convicted of perjury, and if he denies it you may prove that he has been. That may be done under the law of the States, and it is done without any special provision in the nature of an enactment. It is done under the rules of evidence. It goes to the question of determining the weight of the evidence given by the party.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not claim to be accurate, but my recollection of the common law is that the very conviction of a man of perjury itself renders him incompetent as a witness in any case thereafter; that it is competent to give in evidence the fact that a party has been indicted for perjury, but it does not exclude him from the witness stand. I am not sure about it, but it is my recollection that the very conviction of a man of perjury renders him incompetent as a witness. I suggest that there is enough in that for the Senator to look into it, because I do not think there is much doubt about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the United States court the exclusion of a party who has been convicted of perjury is pursuant to section 5392 of the Revised Statutes, which provides in express terms that such a party shall be incapable of giving testimony in any court of the United States until such time as the judgment against him is reversed.

Now, I would suggest in connection with that that it has worked a hardship very often in the States. Parties who have been convicted, but who have prosecuted appeals from the judgment of conviction, have been precluded from testifying in court, and those parties were afterwards relieved from the odium of the charge and the effect of the conviction by the appellate court. Parties other than the persons convicted of perjury have been deprived of the benefit of their testimony in very important legal matters.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just here?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I was going to say that while that provision is in section 5392 of the Revised Statutes, yet it is very often that a statute is merely declaratory of the common law. The Senator will recall to his mind many instances where that is the fact. This is merely declaratory of the common law, as I recollect it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say that the rule of the common law has not been retained in its purity either in England or in this country in regard to matters of evidence. Up to a certain time a witness in the English courts might upon his cross-examination be asked anything that would go to affect the credibility of his testimony. Those who are familiar with the Tichborne case will remember distinctly that a witness on the stand in that case was asked as to the most trivial and the most damaging charges that had been made against him in connection with his life in other cities and in connection with his private life, although it had nothing whatever to do with the issues under consideration, and the court permitted it.

But growing out of that controversy the rules of evidence have been modified and restricted by legislation, because it was so apparent in that case that the rule which was held to be the common-law rule was so open to abuse that it was necessary by legislation to define a boundary beyond which you could not go to discredit a witness who was not a party to the suit, had no interest in it, and was there in enforced attendance in pursuance of a subpœna against which he could make no resistance. So the courts in the interest of protecting such witnesses have modified that rule.

Now, in this country following the consideration of that question, our States by legislation have modified the law as it existed at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, so that there could be no question about it, and to-day in nearly all the State courts, pursuant to the legislation of the States, a party may testify as a witness as to the facts, and it may be shown as against his testimony that he has been convicted of perjury, and the party in whose behalf he testifies may then show that while he has been convicted he is prosecuting an appeal, so as to show that the conviction has not become final; and if he has been convicted and then on appeal has been released, that fact may be shown, and he stands as any other citizen does, clear of the imputation of a crime.

The proposed amendment of the committee here is merely that the rule which pertains in the State courts may pertain in the United States courts, and that a person who is competent in the State courts may be competent in the United States courts. It is in the interest of uniformity in the rules that govern the procedure of the courts in these matters.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next passed-over section will be stated.

The Secretary read section 133, as follows:

SEC. 133. Whoever, being a juror, referee, arbitrator, appraiser, assessor, auditor, master, receiver, United States commissioner, or other person authorized by any law of the United States to hear or determine any question, matter, cause, controversy, or proceeding, shall ask, receive, or agree to receive, any money, property, or value of any kind, or any promise or agreement therefor, upon any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion, action, judgment or decision shall be influenced thereby, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call attention to the fact that this section is new law, but not a new principle of law. It extends the provisions of exising law to a new class of officers and to conditions that have arisen since the enactment of the original law, and while it might be said that it is in the nature of proposed new legislation, yet it is not, except as I have suggested. The same can be said of sections 134, 138, and 163, the following sections.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator think that the words in the section "upon any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion, action, judgment, or decision shall be influenced thereby" are necessary? They may be harmless, but they seem to me superfluous.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think as a matter of first intention, were I drawing the section, I would not insert those words, but they are not inappropriate. They are rather an elaboration of the thought, but not inappropriate.

Mr. BACON. I said they were harmless, but I thought superfluous.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 134. Whoever being, or about to be, a witness upon a trial, hearing, or other proceeding, before any court or any officer authorized by the laws of the United States to hear evidence or take testimony, shall receive or agree or offer to receive a bribe, upon any agreement or understanding that his testimony shall be influenced thereby, or that he will absent himself from the trial, hearing, or other proceeding, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 138. Whoever being a prisoner, confined in a prison, penitentiary, jail, or other place of detention, or being in lawful custody of an officer or other person by authority of the United States, shall escape or attempt to escape from such prison, penitentiary, jail, or other place of detention, or custody, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than seven years, or both.

Mr. HEYBURN. I reserved the right in the committee to suggest my objections to section 138, which makes an attempt to escape by a prisoner in the custody of an officer or in jail a felony.

I have not very much sympathy with that kind of legislation. I think that the officers intrusted with the custody of prisoners should be responsible for their safe-keeping, and if a man who is in the position of a prisoner, either before or after conviction, in that inclination to obtain his liberty which is deep seated in every human being, undertakes to escape, I think the sole responsibility should rest upon the officer, and that it should not be made a crime for the criminal already under conviction, charged with a crime, to attempt to protect himself by that universal law of nature which appeals to all of us.

I therefore submit that section to the wisdom of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether his objection is limited to the case of an attempt or whether it also includes the case of an escape? The reason why I ask the question is that it is not an unusual provision of law in the States to make it a felony for a convict to escape, but there is a vast difference between escaping and attempting to escape, or an alleged attempt to escape. It is easy to charge and difficult to disprove that a prisoner attempted to escape.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me that this class of legislation is equivalent to punishing the prisoner for the fault of the officers of the law who permit him to escape. I have not undertaken to elaborate or formulate my exact objections to this class of legislation, but it does not appeal to me as being necessary at all.

Mr. BACON. I did not mean to commit myself to a support of the view that he should be punished for an escape. I wanted to know what was the attitude of the Senator from Idaho in regard to the matter, whether it included escape or was limited to an attempt to escape.

Mr. HEYBURN. My views are the same in regard to an escape.

Mr. BACON. I think there is indirectly already a penalty to be imposed upon a man who would escape—that he shall not be allowed any commutation of time that would otherwise be given if he had a good record.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that is proper. I think it is proper to deprive the party who attempts to evade the sentence of any privilege under the law, and I think it is proper to punish the officer responsible for his custody for allowing him to escape. But I do not think it is proper to punish the prisoner for the default of the officer in the performance of his duty.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he wants to move to strike out the section. Does the Senator make a motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no motion pending in regard to the section, and it remains in the bill unless by motion it is stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. As a member of the committee and as chairman of the joint committee I have felt it inappropriate that I should move in these matters further than to express the views which I hold and which I expressed in the committee, where I reserved the right to do it. If the position which I suggest does not appeal to any other member of the Senate to such an extent that he is induced to make a motion to strike it out, then I feel that my objection amounts merely to a protest.

Mr. TELLER. I will accommodate the chairman of the committee by moving to strike out section 138.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado moves to strike out section 138.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next section passed over.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 163. Whoever shall so place or connect together different parts of two or more notes, bills, or other genuine instruments issued under the authority of the United States, or by any foreign government, or corporation, as to produce one instrument, with intent to defraud, shall be deemed guilty of forgery in the same manner as if the parts so put together were falsely made or forged, and shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is new legislation in one sense, and yet it is merely an extension of existing provisions of law to a newly discovered manner of committing an offense. When the existing law was enacted such an offense was not contemplated, because if committed at all, the method had not been brought to the notice of the courts. It consists of taking a number of bills apart and shortening each to such a small extent as not to be noticeable, and taking the pieces and putting them together until, by a combination, say, of hundred-dollar notes cut up in this way they would find themselves in possession of enough pieces to make an extra hundred-dollar note. So it is necessary to provide against that kind of an offense.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to interfere with the committee, but it strikes me that an offense of that kind would come within the provisions of the law providing for counterfeiting the currency.

Mr. HEYBURN. This section is in that chapter.

Mr. TELLER. I do not believe it is necessary to put it in. I think the offense the Senator speaks of is prohibited as a counterfeit of the currency itself. However, no harm will come from putting it in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next section passed over.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 185. [Whoever, being the owner, driver, conductor, master, or other person having charge of any stagecoach, railway car, steamboat, or conveyance of any kind which regularly perform trips at stated periods on any post route, or from any city, town, or place to any other city, town, or place between which the mail is regularly carried, and which shall carry, otherwise than in the mail, any letters or packets, except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel, or to some article carried at the same time by the same stagecoach, railway car, or other vehicle, except as otherwise provided by law, shall be fined not more than $50.]

Mr. BACON. That is a section which was passed over at my suggestion when the bill was being read on the former occasion. It seems to me that an examination of it will show that it unnecessarily and unduly and, I may say, improperly restricts the parties engaged in the commerce of the country—that is, I mean the common carriers—in the transmission of communications from one part of their line or from one set of employees to another in the proper performance of their duties and in the operation of their business.

I call attention now to the limitations of this section. Of course Senators will recall that this section is in connection with the penal statutes, the purpose of which is to protect the Government of the United States against the improper carriage of what is properly mail communication by other than the postal authorities. This is one of the sections in that connection, and it is to the effect that no common carrier or other person engaged in like business shall carry any such mail matter or any such communication except—I read simply the exception without reading the entire section over—

Except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel or to some article carried at the same time by the same stagecoach, railway car, or other vehicle.

It will be noted that it would be a penal offense for any official of a railroad company, in case of a wreck on the road and the sudden sending of a relief train, to send on that train any note addressed by one officer of the company to any other official or employee of the company directing what should be done in such a case of emergency. That is not an unusual case by any means. It is something which unfortunately is occurring almost every day in some part of the United States. There is a wreck of a railroad train, and a relief train has to be sent to accomplish what is necessary in the interest of the road and in the interest of humanity. The writing of a note and sending it hurriedly by anyone upon that train would make the party sending it and the party carrying it subject to this large penalty.

It is not necessary to even illustrate by so extreme a case as that. In the operation of railroads it is necessary every day that railroad officials should be communicating up and down the line of road with other officials and employees as to matters connected with the operation of trains or matters relating to the maintenance of the property. They ought to have that opportunity simply as a matter of right and common justice, and to deny it to them is to subject them to very great inconvenience, if not loss.

It is not always practicable even for them to send a telegram from one point to another or from one official to another. It is absolutely necessary that there should be written communications frequently, aside from the fact that there are points along the line where there are no facilities for sending or receiving dispatches.

It seems to me that while the purpose of the section is correct, it ought to be guarded and made more liberal in these particulars. I do not suggest any particular amendment. I suggested the same thought when the matter was before the Senate upon the former occasion. The attention of the committee has been called to it, and they are probably either in a position to show why there should be no amendment or to propose one which will be satisfactory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Colorado if he desires to proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to inquire if this provision would not prevent express companies or if it is intended to prevent express companies from taking packages? It is not uncommon in these days to send by express letters containing money which can be sent by mail, and so can money be sent by mail for that matter. There is also another custom I am somewhat familiar with. Railroad companies frequently make up a package of directions to their subordinates along the line, which they would not want to put in the mail and which are delivered as the train goes along.

I suppose the real purpose in preventing the carriage of a package of this kind was to prevent the carriage for profit, and I think, perhaps, there ought to be some provision that shall prevent a transaction that might arise. The railroads are doing what they have been doing ever since railroads began, I think.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me. He will notice the language of the section. It limits such communications not simply to the officers of the road, but absolutely to officers of the very train upon which the communication goes. It is too rigid entirely.

Mr. TELLER. That is the objection. It is too narrow.

Mr. BACON. It is too narrow.

Mr. TELLER. The only purpose the Government can have in preventing packages of this kind from being carried is to prevent an interference with the revenues of the mail. In a majority of cases, I think, when they start out a train, the railroad companies have more or less packages of instructions to deliver along the line of the road. At least, that was my observation years ago, and I do not believe there has ever been any abuse of it.

Mr. McLAURIN. Why not insert, after the word "carried," in line 10, the words "for hire?"

Mr. TELLER. It is suggested to me that after the word "carried" the words "for hire" be inserted. I think something of that kind ought to be put in. I call the committee's attention to it. Nobody would want to interfere with a railroad company instructing its employees on the line of the road without the trouble of putting the instructions in the mail, which would not reach them until the next day, as a rule.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the section could be construed as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] seem to fear that it may be construed, I would agree with them that it ought to be amended. But I call attention to the fact that the section is existing law; it has been in force and operation, as I recall it, for about thirty-five years, and it has always been construed by the Post-Office Department, by the regulations which they have made under the section, not to include the cases to which the Senator from Georgia referred.

About ten years ago, namely, in 1896, the precise question was referred to the Attorney-General. I call attention to the opinions of the Attorney-General as contained in volume 21 of the Attorney-General's Opinions, page 395. The questions submitted were as follows:

You refer me to section 3992 also—

After calling attention to 3985—

You refer me to section 3992 also, which is as follows:

"Nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit the conveyance or transmission of letters or packets by private hands without compensation, or by special messenger employed for the particular occasion only."

You ask:

And these are the questions submitted by the Post-Office Department—

"(1) Can the railroad companies carry, outside of the mails, not in Government stamped envelopes, any first-class mail matter except such as concerns the cargo carried by the road?

"(2) Is it proper for a railroad company to carry, outside of the mails, not in Government stamped envelopes, first-class mail matter intended for a connecting line?

"(3) Is it proper for a railroad company to carry, outside of the mails, first-class mail matter not in Government stamped envelopes, for companies, corporations, or private individuals operating car lines, transportation lines (either passenger of freight), operating hotels, restaurants, or any other class of business that may either be connected or not connected with the railroad proper?

"(4)—

And this is the question the Senator from Georgia himself submits:

"(4) Can such companies as mentioned in the third question carry their own mail; and if so, under what circumstances?"

The Attorney-General then calls attention to the fact that the Post-Office Department has always construed the law as permitting railroad companies and other carriers to carry mail matter having reference to their own business, whether it has relation to the cargo or not. He calls attention to the fact that a written regulation of the Post-Office Department is in existence to that effect, and then proceeds:

Congress evidently had no thought of interfering with the private methods of carriers on post routes for communicating directly with their own employees or with other persons. It was dealing only with their public business of carrying for others. Therefore no exception was required in this respect and no argument is to be drawn from its omission from the expression of exceptions.

Then he calls attention to a part that I will omit and proceeds:

The clause above quoted from the postal regulations was manifestly not intended to do more than carry out the law. Otherwise it would, of course, be invalid. But taken not to refer to letters of others than the carrying company, it is consistent and proper. Such, I am confident, was the meaning intended.

So, in accordance with the uniform practice of the Post-Office Department the opinion of the Attorney-General, after a very thorough consideration of the question, is that this section or any section of the law would not interfere with a railroad company carrying letters about its own business, letters addressed to its employees, or to its officers, and would prevent, except as provided in the section itself the carrying of mails for others or for the public.

Mr. BACON. For us to accept the explanation as given by the learned Senator from Utah, it would be necessary, it seems to me, to recognize the power of a Department officer to amend a statute, because the statute certainly does not give any such privilege as that which the Attorney-General construes it to give. I do not know who the Attorney-General was, and it matters not who he was, because the language is too plain to be possibly perverted to that extent and the perversion be justified.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, the Attorney-General does not hold that the Department had the power to alter the law or modify the law, but he calls attention to the regulation and says that the regulation is simply a recognition of the law. I call the attention of the Senator to what the Attorney-General says.

Mr. BACON. I heard the Senator read it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, the Attorney-General says:

The clause above quoted from the postal regulations was manifestly not intended to do more than carry out the law. Otherwise it would, of course, be invalid.

It is simply a recognition, in other words, of what the courts would hold the law to mean if there were no regulations at all on the subject.

Mr. BACON. I repeat what I said. I understood fully without the repetition by the Senator from Utah exactly what the Attorney-General said. He was basing his opinion upon the regulation and saying that the regulation was a proper construction of the law. My proposition is that it is an impossibility that such should be the case, unless we recognize the right of a Department, as I am sorry to say is very frequently attempted in some of the Departments, to construe away a law by their interpretation and by their construction.

I will read now from the original law, to see whether it is possible that it could be said that the law authorized any such regulation as that which has been made in regard to it. The regulation simply recognizes the propriety that there should be a law; that is, that it should have the modificaion which I now suggest, but that modification can not be found in the law as it exists, and the language of it is as follows:

SEC. 3985. No stagecoach, railway car, steamboat, or other vehicle or vessel which regularly performs trips at stated periods on any post-route, or from any city, town, or place, to any other city, town, or place, between which the mail is regularly carried, shall carry, otherwise than in the mail, any letters or packets, except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel, or to some article carried at the same time by the same stagecoach, railway car, or other vehicle.

Mr. President, that language which says that the only exception is where the communication relates to some matter upon that particular train or that particular car can be construed to mean any business of the company I say is an utter absolute impossibility, I do not care who the Attorney-General was, or who the judge was, if need be. It could not stand for a moment in discussion or for the guidance of any lawyers in the construction of the law and in determining whether an amendment is necessary.

I repeat, the opinion of the Attorney-General in upholding the regulation is simply a recognition of the fact that the present law is absolutely too narrow. We are revising the law for the purpose of ascertaining and remedying its imperfections, and here is a most glaring one, one that even the Departments have recognized to such an extent that they have refused to enforce it. It is true they had no right to disregard it. No Department has a right to disregard a law, whether it is a proper law or an improper law. They have but one duty, and that duty is obedience to the law as it is written. Here we find that it was so unjust a law that they have undertaken to disobey the law and to try to construe it away. We are engaged in its revision, and yet we are to pass it by without making the proper correction of it.

I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] when he says it is entirely too narrow. It is only by a violation of the law, and a daily violation of the law, with the connivance and approval of the Department, that the railroad companies are enabled to do their business at all. If the law was enforced, half of them would be in the penitentiary to-day, unjustly and improperly.

Mr. TELLER. In order to have some certainty about it I suggest, after the word "carrier," in line 10, to add "for compensation." That would prevent them from carrying it except for their own uses. We would not prevent them from carrying it for their own uses.

I lived some years in a part of the country where we got mail by paying specially for it. For some years in Colorado, when the stagecoach got in, we went to the stage office to get our mail and we paid so much a letter. It was a rather high price for a letter, but we paid it because the stages would get in without the mail quicker than they would with it, and at that time the stages did carry large quantities of mail. It was a large part, or a considerable part at least, of the revenue of the stagecoach. I presume about that time the act was passed, but, as was said, it was very awkardly constructed. I have no fault to find with the principle. They should not carry except for their own use, and I do not know that they do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that the purpose of this section of existing law was to protect the income of the Post-Office Department and to prevent the carrying of mail under such circumstances that it would not bring any compensation to the Government.

I think I must call attention to the provision that was omitted from existing law by the committee; that is, the reference to section 3993 of the Revised Statutes. It is proper to call the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the omitted section, because in existing law section 3993 is made a part of section 3985 of the Revised Statutes. Your committee have reported section 3985, as represented by section 185, without including within its provisions section 3993. I will read section 3993, and I commend it to the close attention of the Senators who are considering this amendment. Section 3993 reads:

All letters inclosed in stamped envelopes, if the postage stamp is of a denomination sufficient to cover the postage that would be chargeable thereon if the same were sent by mail, may be sent, conveyed, and delivered otherwise than by mail, provided such envelope shall be duly directed and properly sealed, so that the letter can not be taken therefrom without defacing the envelope, and the date of the letter or of the transmission or receipt thereof shall be written or stamped upon the envelope. But the Postmaster-General may suspend the operation of this section upon any mail route where the public interest may require such suspension.

The committee have omitted that provision of existing law from the section as reported. They have omitted the provision permitting the Postmaster-General to suspend the operation of the law as to the class of mail referred to in section 185, and they have permitted the special license given by section 3993 with reference to the carrying of this class of mail. They have done that because it was in one sense redundant, and in the other sense it was calculated to open the way for diminishing the revenue and the income of the Post-Office Department. That being the primary object of the enactment of the existing section 3985, it was thought that it was utterly inconsistent to allow, by reference contained in that section to another section, the provision of section 3993 to cast doubt upon the meaning of the provision in the existing law. It was also in the interest of combining all that it was necessary to express under one section, instead of compelling reference to two sections widely apart in the printed laws.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have not overlooked the section to which the Senator from Idaho refers. Of course, so far as stamped envelopes and things of that kind are concerned, it would be a great hardship upon a railway company in the matter of its business if, every time it saw proper to send a communication from one to another of its employees, it had to use a stamped envelope.

So far as the suspension of the provision of the act is concerned, of course no suspension would be of any value unless it was a permanent and continuous one, because it is a matter of daily importance and necessity.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the executive order which Senators have criticised with reference to this matter is, under the provision, contained in section 3993, authorizing the making of the executive order. The question submitted to the Attorney-General was whether or not the existing law taken together should be so interpreted as to make the executive order operative and as to whether or not the executive order was within the scope of power given to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Senators in charge of this bill to consent to an amendment. I do not see any possible justification for our leaving upon the statute books a statute the operation of which under its terms would be either practically impossible or it would have to be disregarded or else work very great hardship and injustice to the common carriers of all kinds in this country.

The Senators will note the fact that in the existing law and in the proposed modification of the law it is recognized that there is some business which even the common carriers have about which they ought to be permitted to send certain communications. The only criticism upon the law as it exists and upon the proposed modification of it is that that restriction is too narrow, or rather that it is not a sufficiently liberal exception to the law. The exception in words limits the communications which can be sent by a common carrier by its own stagecoach or railway train or steamboat to something which relates to the particular train, etc., upon which the communication is sent. It could not relate, as I have endeavored to illustrate, to the case of a wreck where the communication was sent by a relief train. When the thing is as plain as that, why should we not make the law mean what the Department has endeavored to make it mean by its construction and by the construction which the Attorney-General puts upon the regulation of the Department? Why should we not in the revision of the law make the law itself plain and make it say what we all know it must say if it is to be of any value to the railroads or to the steamboats or to the stagecoaches, rather than leave a restriction upon it which must be a dead letter, or else there will be a great injustice done under it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am afraid if the amendment suggested were adopted that it would cost more thousands of dollars to the Post-Office Department than I should like to undertake to compute at this time. The very fact that the two words suggested in the amendment, the words "for pay," are not in this section places the railroad company upon the same footing as other business concerns.

Mr. BACON. I am not in favor of that amendment. That was not the amendment I was going to propose.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is an amendment already proposed.

Mr. BACON. I at first thought that amendment would be sufficient; but then it occurred to me that under that a railroad company could carry messages for anybody else; and if they did not charge for doing so, they would not be subject to the penalty of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Or messages of its own.

Mr. BACON. Or of its own, either.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not intended that a railroad company should be permitted to carry its own general messages on any other terms than the general public may.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not intended that a railroad shall have the right to communicate with its employees on any more liberal terms than a merchant shall have the right to communicate with his employees. The law as it was drawn was drawn for the express purpose of putting the transportation companies on the same footing, with reference to the right to transport matters proper for the United States mails, as other business people. There is no reason why they should be upon any other footing. Merely because a railroad company has the opportunity or the conveniences that would enable it to carry its mail matter free if nobody found it out is no reason why it should be permitted to do it, and whenever they transmit messages through the United States mails that other people would have to pay for when they transmit them over the same lines, the law intended that they should pay for it. If they avoided that through the medium of any rule or regulation or executive order, they have done it at the expense of the general public. The intent of the law is as the Senator suggests it should be, and it was, I think, expressed in this statute by Congress for the purpose of doing just what the Senator contends for, namely, putting the transportation companies upon the same plane as all other companies. By the amendment the committee has reported, the striking out of the right to suspend the operation of the law by the Postmaster-General we have emphasized the fact in the law that they are upon the same footing. If they are violating it, an investigation should disclose the fact, and they should be punished as other persons are punished.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I did not have the opportunity to explain the state of the case before the Senator—I presume it was intended merely as an interruption—got away from the particular point I was on. I recognize the fact that there are a great many communications which the railroad companies ought to be permitted to use the mails in sending. I do not doubt that at all; but the point I am after is that there are a great many communications which it is impracticable for them to send by mail and which would be absolutely useless to them if they had to wait until the mails could carry them. For instance, I have twice mentioned an illustration, the case of a wrecked train upon a railroad, where a relief train is sent to the wreck. Of course the Senator will recognize that a communication which was intended to be sent to the employees around that wreck as to what they should do could not be sent by mail. Such communications must be sent speedily; they must be sent by the train itself that is going to the relief of the wreck. That is only one illustration that could be given. It would be impracticable for a railroad official in Washington, for instance, when there is a wreck 40 miles out on one of the railroads leading to this city to mail to the parties at that wreck a communication directing them what they should do; and it would be necessary either to do that or to violate this law, because there is no word or letter in this law under which such an official act could send to the point of that wreck any communication by the train which was sent to its relief.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will permit me to finish.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will probably appreciate my motive in making a suggestion.

Mr. BACON. I know that, but it is impossible to present anything with any degree of continuity when frequently interrupted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this bill only refers to conveyance on trains making or performing regular trips at stated periods for the purpose of carrying the mail. It has nothing to do with a relief train or a wreck train. That would not come within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BACON. It might be sent by other than a relief train. It might be sent by a passenger train that was going to that place. It might not be necessary to send a relief train from that particular point.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me. I will be through in a moment.

Mr. McLAURIN. I was just going to make a suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. McLAURIN. The Senator from Idaho [Mr HEYBURN], I think, misconstrues the statute. The prohibition is not against the railroad company carrying the communication on one of its wreck trains, but on a regular train they can not carry it at any time.

Mr. BACON. Yes; the Senator from Mississippi is doubtless correct in that. But, Mr. President, there are any number of other illustrations that could be made which will occur to anyone who is familiar with the business of railroads. I mention railroads simply because they are the ones that this would most seriously affect, though it affects not only the railroads, but any other party having vehicles of any kind engaged in making regular trips; in other words, it affects all common carriers.

It is not only occasionally when there is a wreck, but there are daily instances where officers in charge of a property have to give directions that will not admit of delay, where they have to send communications by the swiftest means possible, by their fastest trains, directions for different stations, possibly directions by which trains are to be kept out of each other's way. It is true that now the operation of trains is almost entirely controlled by telegraph communications, but the telegraphic facilities might not be serviceable. There would be no excuse for a railroad company to say, however, "Our telegraph communication was interrupted, and therefore we violated the law." There is no exception made whatever.

What I want Senators to recognize the propriety of is not a provision that would go to the extent of permitting any mail to be carried, or any letters to be carried, for which compensation was not charged, but one that would enlarge the exception now made in the law. The exception now in the law is limited to the case of a communication which relates to the business of the particular train or the particular car upon which the letter is carried or to some article found in the car upon which the letter is carried. It certainly could be no narrower than that; whereas it might be equally important that it should relate to a train which preceded it or to something which a train carried which preceded it, or to a passenger on another train, or to a train which was to follow—more frequently a train which was to follow—or it might relate to the roadbed or to any other matter connected with the daily operation of the road.

I do not wish any amendment which would so enlarge it that the railroad companies would feel that they were at liberty to send upon their trains any letter which they might wish to send which related to their business. That would probably be too wide a liberty to allow them; but it is not too much to say that they ought to have the right to send any communication which relates to the current daily operation and maintenance of the road.

I am not prepared at the moment to frame the amendment in a way that it can be incorporated in this section so as to be entirely harmonious with the other provisions in it and with the language which is already there, and therefore, if the Senators are prepared to recognize the propriety of so enlarging the exception that it will embrace communications which relate to the current daily operation and maintenance of the road, I would suggest that it might lie over until the Senators can have an opportunity to amend it in that particular.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I entirely agree with the position of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. The only claim I make about it is that the law as it at present reads deals with the question in precisely the same way that it would be dealt with if there was an amendment.

The Senator criticises the opinion of the Attorney-General with reference to this matter. If he will take the trouble to read the entire opinion he will conclude, I think, that it is an opinion of some force. It was certainly rendered by a lawyer of very eminent ability and one whom I think the Senator will especially recognize as such a lawyer. It was rendered in 1896 by Judson Harmon, who has usually been considered a pretty fair lawyer.

Mr. BACON. I could not agree that any lawyer could possibly control my judgment on a proposition as plain as this, where the language expressly says that the only exception is as to a train—the same train as that which carries the letter, or to some article upon that train which carries the letter. When any lawyer says that relates to any business of the road, he can not convince my judgment about it, because the language does not justify it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the Attorney-General, Mr. President, says that Congress, in passing this law, was dealing only with the public business of the railroad or of the carrier in carrying for others, and was not dealing with the question of its private methods of communicating directly with its own employees or other persons. Every law has a spirit as well as a letter, and the opinion of the Attorney-General is that it is within the spirit of this law that common carriers should be permitted to carry letters which have reference to their current business; and I was going to say that that is my idea about the meaning of the law.

Mr. BACON. If that is true, what objection is there to expressing it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was just going to say, when the Senator interrupted me, that that being my opinion as to the meaning of the law, I would have no objection whatever to inserting, say in line 7, after the word "vessel," the words "or to the business of the carrier," so that it would read:

Except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel, or to the business of the carrier, or to some article carried at the same time by the same stagecoach, railway car, or other vehicle.

Mr. BACON. I am willing to have the Senator make it even narrower than that, and say the "current" business, in order that it might not relate to their financial transactions or anything of that kind, but to current business and operation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Personally I have no objection to that amendment. I think it would carry out the evident intention of the law, but my colleague on the committee [Mr. HEYBURN] does not appear to agree with me with reference to that. I am therefore not in a position to speak for the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] suggests that I am not in accord with the proposition to amend this law by allowing a railroad company or a company of any kind that carries the mails to have any rights that other people do not have. There is no reason why a company, because it happens to be a mail-carrying transportation company, should have the right to send its communications through the mail without paying postage; and, I imagine, that an amendment that exempted them from it would mean a rather large deficit in the Post-Office Department in a year. If you take all the transportation companies in the United States that carry the mails and allow them an exemption from paying postage upon mail matter that they naturally would forward pertaining to their own business, then other people who engage in business would claim the right to have their communications, directed to their employees wherever they might be, also carried free of postage. Congress undoubtedly intended in enacting the existing law to place the transportation companies upon the same footing as other people.

If this were a matter of some one mail route, it would be a small thing; but I am safe in saying that it would mean a great many thousand dollars in a year, and it might mean some hundreds of thousands of dollars if you exempt public carriers from paying postage upon their communications because, forsooth, they are directed to somebody on their pay rolls. That is the reason Congress in enacting this law did not give them the privilege of carrying their own mail matter free; and they should not have it.

Mr. BACON. Why did not the Senator, then, when he was revising the law strike out the provision in this section which does permit them to carry some things in the mail which it is not permitted to the general public to carry?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator submits a question to me, and I will answer it. It is because the provisions of this section, as reported, do not permit them to carry anything that would necessarily be the subject of communication and that would go through the United States mail. The language is quite guarded, and it was evidently adopted with a great deal of care by those who enacted the existing law. The words are:

Except such as relate to some part of the cargo.

The words "except such" relate back to the words "any letters or packets"—packets which relate to some part of the cargo; that is, the manifest, the bill of lading, or whatever it may be. It means papers that pertain to and are in fact a necessary part of the cargo itself, as much so as the inscription upon the packet that tells to whom it is to be delivered or whom it is from.

Any letters or packets, except such as relate to some part of the cargo.

That limits them right down to the necessity of those things incident to receiving and delivering the cargo itself. They are not permitted to carry letters of general information, but they must be letters that pertain to the cargo. Those are letters of instruction.

I admit that if it is the pleasure of Congress to enlarge the powers of these common carriers and to extend to them the right to carry free all communications that may pertain to their business because they happen to be addressed to some employee, that is another proposition. That goes to the question of the wisdom of such legislation; but we are dealing now with existing law, and the committee has reported it as it exists. We are simply maintaining that the existing law is sufficient for the purpose. Should Congress in its wisdom see fit to enter upon the consideration of new legislation extending or widening the rights of these companies, that will be a matter to be referred to the proper standing committee of this body and there determined as to whether or not it should be taken up for consideration.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, my greatest objection to this provision is that some stage driver who happens to be making regular trips would, if he were, out of the kindness of his heart, to take a letter for some friend and deliver it to another friend on the way, be liable to pay a fine of $50. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will obviate all trouble about this, and I do not think it would do the harm that is apprehended by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] in charge of the bill.

This section, as we all agree, is intended to protect the revenue to be derived from the carrying of the mail. There is not going to be any inroad upon the revenue by permitting a man once in a while to carry to a friend a letter or packet—I do not know what "packet" means; but it is, I suppose, a package that would be mailable—unless he does it for the purpose of making money. Just an occasional carrying of a letter to some friend is not going to affect the revenues of the country. I think, therefore, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to put the words "for compensation" just after the word "carry," in line 10, would accomplish a great deal of good. It will make clear the construction that was given to it by Attorney-General Harmon, and it will not be necessary to construe this section. My opinion is that that amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does not the Senator from Mississippi think that if we were to adopt that amendment it would permit one common carrier to carry mail for all the connecting carriers and for the connecting carriers, in turn, to carry mail for the one, so that in that way there would be a network of railroad companies all over the United States carrying mail for one another? They would not be carrying for compensation, but they would be carrying under some common understanding, and that would make, it seems to me, very serious inroads on the revenues of the Department.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, in answer to that question, I do not think there is any danger of that, for if they were to make an arrangement of that kind it would itself be for compensation. It would be a quid pro quo and it would violate the law. I do not think, though, that the railroads would be benefited to any extent by an arrangement of that kind, because it would retard their mail, instead of speeding it. The railroads, like everybody else, are interested in having rapid transit for their mail, rapid delivery for their mail, and they would not make any arrangement of that kind. If it were made, as I have just stated, it would be a violation of the law, because it would be a compensation itself. If I give a man my services for services of his in return, I am compensated for my services and so is he for his services. So it would be with the railroads. My idea about it is, though, that there ought to be some provision whereby an innocent man, probably one in an humble position and following an humble pursuit, would not stumble into a pitfall when, out of the goodness of his heart, he was trying to do a favor to some friend of his or to somebody, whether he was a friend or not.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply want to make one final suggestion to the Senators in charge of the bill, and that is that this provision shall be made to express in exact language what the Attorney-General says it means; that is all. The Attorney-General says, in the opinion which has been read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], that the purpose of the law was to prevent common carriers carrying mail matter for others. Now, I only ask that the Senators will themselves amend this section so as to make it express what the Attorney-General of the United States says it means. It does not in language so express itself, and I simply ask that it shall be made in language to express exactly what the Attorney-General says was the intention of the lawmakers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that, so far as I am concerned, if he will offer the amendment I will support it.

Mr. BACON. Very well. If the Senator from Idaho insists upon his objection, I shall have to ask that the Senate shall determine between us.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I considered it a matter of small importance, I would not insist upon it, but, as I see it, the acceptance of the language suggested will be simply to exempt railroad companies and transportation companies from paying postage at all. I am not willing to do it.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. If that is the position of the Senator from Georgia, I suggest that we should suspend for the day.

Mr. HEYBURN. Every day I have the pressure for an executive session along about the time we get into the midst of the consideration of this bill. There is no reason why the mere suggestion of the Senator from Georgia as to this amendment should suspend the consideration of the bill. We have passed several such Rubicons to-day. It simply means that we pass over the consideration of this section until we have finished the consideration of the sections against which no objections are urged.

I should like to proceed a little longer to-day. I know that the suggestion of an executive session is a continual haunt from the time we take up this bill until we adjourn. I should like to proceed longer if we can, passing over this section for the day, and we may dispose of a number of other sections.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will not insist upon proceeding further to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask that the section may be passed over for the day, as we have passed over other sections.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will not insist on going further with the bill this afternoon. All of us have a good deal of work that we can not attend to while the Senate is in session; at least, those of us who attend the sessions can not. There are some of us who are always here, and it is absolutely necessary that those of us who do give attention to the business of the Senate should have some little time outside for business equally imperative that we must attend to.

I will say to the Senator that there has not been a time within two weeks that I have been able to leave the Capitol until after dark. We can not stay here all day until the night comes and properly attend to many things we have to do outside the particular session of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course I have no control over this matter. Any Senator can move to adjourn or he can make another motion that would suspend the consideration of this measure. I only appeal for such liberal time as will enable us to make some headway. There are two sections intervening between this section, and one that we will be compelled to pause at. It would take but a few minutes to dispose of them, and we would then have accomplished at least that much.

Mr. BACON. If they are not sections which will be contested I have no objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are not sections to which I think objection will be urged at this time. One is against robbing a mail carrier. I suppose that is a legitimate subject of legislation.

Mr. BACON. The Senator desires to consider section 198.

Mr. HEYBURN. One hundred and ninety-eight and 198a.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HEYBURN. We will pass over the consideration of section 185 for to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be passed over. The next passed-over section will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 198. Whoever shall rob any carrier, agent, or other person intrusted with the mail, of such mail, or any part thereof, shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten years; and if convicted a second time of a like offense, or if, in effecting such robbery the first time, the robber shall wound the person having custody of the mail, or put his life in jeopardy by the use of a dangerous weapon, he shall be imprisoned for life.

Mr. HEYBURN. The next is section 198a.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no such section in the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Notice was given at the time of the intention to propose what is here as 198a, as an amendment or an addition to section 198. It should have been noted, but whether it was or not is not material. I ask that 198a in the reprint be read in order that the necessary motion may be made in connection with it. It is printed in the reprint. It was suggested when the bill was read before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho propose it as an amendment to the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. I intend to, it already being at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was moved as an amendment before and considered and passed up. I will move it as an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 198a. Whoever shall attempt to rob the mail by assaulting the person having custody thereof, shooting at him or his horse, or threatening him with a dangerous weapon, and shall not effect such robbery, shall be imprisoned not less than two nor more than ten years.

Mr. KEAN. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the mail carrier might not have a horse. He might have an automobile or something of that kind.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was the purpose of the committee to combine in one section sections 5472 and 5473 of the Revised Statutes, existing law, inasmuch as they pertain to the same character of offense. If the Senator from New Jersey will suggest an amendment as to other methods of conveyance which might be attacked within the contemplation of the section, I should be glad to accept it, so far as I may.

Mr. KEAN. At the present moment I have not given sufficient consideration to the subject, but I know that on some of our rural routes in New Jersey the carriers have bicycles and bicycles that are run by gasoline power and also automobiles. Therefore I think they ought to be protected as much as the horse in the carrying of the mails.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was not thought necessary, in the wisdom of those who enacted that statute, to provide against shooting at a stage coach or mail wagon. The offense intended to be reached by this provision is interfering with a person having custody of the mail, and upon the same principle that the shooting of an animal upon which a man is riding is considered to have the effect of disabling him, so as to render him unable to perform his duty, the horse was included.

Mr. KEAN. But the same thing would happen in case the carrier used a vehicle.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir; a man may be compelled to go afoot, but it has not heretofore been thought necessary to make it an offense to shoot a wagon or any inanimate thing. I would have no objection to an amendment which would prevent the disabling of a mail carrier, but we are dealing only with existing law in this section.

Mr. BACON. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment, and did not have an opportunity to hear what was said on the subject. I have not yet had an opportunity to read the section at this time, but if I recollect what occurred on a former occasion the new provision destroys the distinction heretofore existing between a plain assault on the officer and an attempt to commit violence at the same time. I know I am correct. The Senators will recall the debate we had on it before.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is right about that, and I think I can straighten it out in a moment, if he will permit me.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Section 198 as reported by the committee undertook to embody the provisions of sections 5472 and 5473. When it was under discussion it was the understanding of the Senate that the provisions of both of those sections would be restored in place of section 198 as reported by the committee. So the amendment which should be considered by the Senate is a proposition to substitute the provisions of those two sections for the provisions of the single section 198, namely, 198 and 198a both together.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may assist some in straightening this out, my notes on the margin of the printed bill that I used when this matter was before the Senate originally are that "Senator BACON moves to restore the original sections 5472 and 5473 as the law in lieu of section 198." That was agreed to, and it remained only that they might be molded in form as a matter of construction.

Mr. BACON. That has not been done in this instance.

Mr. HEYBURN. That has not been done.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator propose to do it, or does the Senator now object to its being done?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no objection at all. The Senate has voted that it be done, and it is a completed act on the part of the Senate. It is merely a question of not having actually rewritten the section. The only changes necessary to be made will be to adopt the formal language "whoever shall" instead of "any person who," and rewrite the section in conformity with the general rule of construction.

Mr. BACON. I was, unfortunately, called out of the Chamber—as we frequently are, and very much to the prejudice of the proper conduct of the public business—and I have lost the connection. I do not know what occurred while I was absent. Therefore I will now ask that this section lie over until I can have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To which section does the Senator from Georgia refer?

Mr. BACON. Sections 198 and 198a.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Those sections will lie over at the request of the Senator from Georgia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 13, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that our Republic is not ungrateful, but that she honors herself in keeping sacred the memory of her illustrious sons who, in peace and in war, gave themselves, a living sacrifice, to her honor and glory; that to-day throughout the length and breadth of our Union her patriotic sons and daughters will meet to pay a loving tribute of gratitude and respect to Abraham Lincoln, the savior of his country—strong in his intellectual powers, pure, tender, loving of heart, a patriot, a statesman, a Christian, the marvel of his age. We thank Thee for him, for what he was, and for what he did; and we most earnestly pray that we may strive to emulate his virtues and leave behind us a record worthy in Christian citizenship. And Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, as I recollect it, when we rose yesterday a point of order was pending against lines 10 to 13 on page 52. I assume the point of order is not well taken, but as a further inducement to the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his point of order, I desire to have an amendment read which, when the point of order is disposed of, I propose to offer in lieu of this section. I now ask the Clerk to read it simply for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the work of constructing an irrigation system within the diminished Shoshone and Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, $125,000: Provided, That said sum be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the sale of lands made under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905. (33 Stat. L., p. 1616.)

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question? As I understand, the amendment absolutely safeguards the interests of the Government and will provide that no portion of this money in the end comes out of the General Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the intention, Mr. Chairman, but I think I need to make a brief explanation in reference to that,

The act of 1905, confirming an agreement with the Shoshone Indians, provided for the disposal of the lands by the Government and provided how the funds derived from such sale should be disposed of. Amongst other things—I will not go into all the details about how much there was to be expended for schools, etc.—there was a provision that this irrigation system should be constructed and that it should be paid for to the amount of $150,000, it then being thought that that sum would be ample to construct the system. It has since developed that it is not sufficient. Now, further on in the agreement there is a provision that the balance of the sum may be expended, amongst other things, "for such other purposes for the comfort, benefit, etc., of the Indians as the Indians in council may direct and the Secretary of the Interior approve."

Now, the Indians in council have not yet directed that these expenditures be made; but, Mr. Chairman, I believe that under the Lone Wolf decision we have ample authority, notwithstanding the words of this statute, to provide that this money expended for the Indians shall be reimbursed to the Treasury. I believe my friend from Illinois is familiar with the Lone Wolf decision, which, broadly stated, was that the United States had full power as the guardian of the Indians to expend their funds in any way that Congress thought wise, provided it was for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the matter, in the agreement with the Indians there was a provision for this irrigation plant and an agreement for the expenditure of so much money.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. I understood that that entire amount had been appropriated heretofore.

Mr. SHERMAN. For this irrigation system—that is correct also; the $150,000 has been expended, but it has been ascertained that that $150,000 is not sufficient to complete the system, and more money must be expended, or, under the statutes of Wyoming relating to water rights, the benefit will be lost.

Mr. MANN. How much money is this going to cost? In the first place, there was an estimate of so much, and it was supposed that the $150,000 would be sufficient. Now you propose not to complete the system, but to appropriate $125,000 to continue the construction of the system.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have talked this morning with the chief engineer of irrigation of the Indian Service, who assured me that not to exceed one more appropriation of this amount will be sufficient to complete the irrigation service, which will irrigate approximately 45,000 acres, which, when put under this irrigation system, will be readily worth $30 an acre. Or, in other words, at the conclusion of this work, involving an expenditure of $450,000, we shall have placed the Indians in possession of lands now substantially worthless, but which will then be worth a million and a quarter dollars.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman proposes to offer the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I offer the amendment which was read a moment ago for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 10, 11, 12, and 13 on page 52 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For continuing the work of constructing an irrigation system within the diminished Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, $125,000: Provided, That said sum be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the sale of lands made under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905." (33 Stat. L., p. 1616.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment, to follow the amendment just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all lands alloted to Indians in severalty, or reserved for their use in common on the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, susceptible of irrigation, may be leased for a term not exceeding twenty years for cultivation, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and he is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying this provision into full force and effect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this legislation is necessary and important, in order that the lands to be irrigated under the project provided for in the preceding paragraph may be utilized. As the law now stands the Secretary can not make an agricultural lease for a longer term than five years. It is impossible in that region to secure tenants on a five-year lease. They are compelled to erect their buildings, prepare the land, and make such improvements as are necessary to make homes upon the land, and this development and settlement can only be had upon a longer lease than is now provided for by law.

I would say that the matter has not been brought to the attention of the committee prior to this time, owing to the fact that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has been desirous of having a general provision of this character; but inasmuch as there seems to be some objection to a general provision, we are very anxious, indeed, that this provision be made with regard to these lands, and the chairman of the committee has a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he indorses and urges this legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the communication which I have is not from the Commissioner, but from the Secretary. The gentleman from Wyoming has covered the ground in the few moments that he has occupied, so I hardly think it is necessary to have the letter read, but I will have it incorporated in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 6, 1908.

Hon. J. S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference for report, of a copy of H. R. 15459, entitled "A bill authorizing the leasing of Indian lands on the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation in Wyoming."

The bill authorizes the leasing of lands allotted to Indians in severalty or reserved for their use in common on the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, Wyo., which are susceptible of irrigation, for a term not exceeding twenty years, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make such regulations as may be necessary to carry the provisions of the act into effect.

The development of the arid waste by means of irrigation has brought about a condition of affairs which makes it imperative that a more liberal law be enacted authorizing the leasing of Indian allotments and tribal lands. This is true not only of the Shoshone Reservation, but of nearly all others in the Western States. Irrigation has brought to the Indian's door something entirely foreign to his normal condition. Intensive farming means the employment of many people in a very limited space, and the Indian's objection to farming and cattle raising seems to be based, at least in part, upon his aversion to separation from his family and friends.

Under existing law it is not possible to effect a lease of irrigable lands on reservations (except on the Fort Belknap Reservation in Montana) or of allotments for a sufficient period of time to warrant the reclamation of the lands by the intending lessees.

H. R. 15459 makes it possible to lease irrigable lands on the Shoshone Reservation for such a term as would induce prospective lessees to construct irrigation systems on the lands leased, with a reasonable hope of a material profit from the outcome of their undertakings.

I believe Congress could enact no wiser law than legislation authorizing the leasing of all Indian lands susceptible of irrigation, either tribal or allotted, for farming purposes, for a long term of years.

Acting on this belief I had caused to be prepared a draft of a bill whereby this would be possible. This bill is printed in Senate Document No. 72, Sixtieth Congress, first session.

The bill inclosed by you has my hearty approval, and I respectfully recommend that it be enacted into law.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provides for the lease of allotted lands?

Mr. MONDELL. For allotted lands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What are the Indians to do?

Mr. MONDELL. It is impossible for the Indians, no further advanced in civilization than they are, to cultivate 160 acres each. They cultivate small areas. It is not possible at this time, and probably will not be in the near future, to get the Indians to cultivate all of their holdings. Now, as my friend knows, under the laws of irrigation regions there must be a continuous application of water in order to preserve the water rights. So this is not only in the interest of the Indians to give them an income, but it is necessary in order to preserve the water rights for them. Of course the Secretary of the Interior will, in the exercise of his discretion, lease only such lands as the Indians are not able to cultivate themselves, or such as they can not be persuaded to cultivate.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is the irrigation project provided for in the preceding section contemplated for the irrigation of unallotted lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. At least no considerable area of such lands.

Mr. HINSHAW. The proposition is to lease the allotted lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the gentleman from Wyoming to be in favor of leasing Indian lands so that the Indians may derive a revenue therefrom.

Mr. MONDELL. That is my thought.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and I have a bill pending before that committee providing for the lease of the general public lands of the United States so that the United States may derive some benefit from them.

Mr. MONDELL. That is quite another question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman explain why he is in favor of the leasing of the lands of the Indians to give them some benefit and is not in favor of a lease of the general lands of the United States?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman's question is not germane to this discussion. I would be glad to answer it at the proper time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is the intention to leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to determine what shall be done with the proceeds of the leases?

Mr. MONDELL. The proceeds in every case, following the general law, will be used for the benefit of the Indians. We do not in any way change the general provisions of law providing for leases. We simply extend the period and make new provision as to how the money shall be paid to the Indians. It is not intended to go into that question at all, but simply to give the Secretary the authority to make a longer lease.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving a point of order, I would like to ask the gentleman whether his amendment is the same as the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. It is; the amendment is the bill.

Mr. MANN. The bill does not refer merely to allotted lands. I ask that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the original term of restriction as to this land?

Mr. MONDELL. On alienation? Twenty-five years.

Mr. HACKNEY. When does that expire?

Mr. MONDELL. In twenty-one to twenty-three years from now. The intent was to bring it within the period of nonalienation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What would be the value of this land per acre per year? How much revenue would the Indians derive?

Mr. MONDELL. I could not say. I could not even make a guess.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Two cents an acre?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; I should say much more; possibly as much as 50 cents or $1 in some cases.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Rental each year?

Mr. MONDELL. I should say so.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that I am heartily in favor of the amendment. I think the Indians should lease their lands.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I am trying to get information in reference to the amendment, if the Chair will bear with me. The gentleman from Wyoming stated that this was intended to apply to allotted lands. The amendment does apply to allotted lands and lands reserved for other use in common. Can the gentleman tell how much land there is of that kind and what is the reason for leasing common land?

Mr. MONDELL. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this provides only for the leasing of irrigable lands for agricultural purposes. Now, it is possible that there might be here and there some areas within the irrigated tracts that might not have been allotted. So far as I am concerned, I know of no objection to striking out that feature of the amendment, though I assume that it was intended to cover small tracts within the irrigated area as might not have been allotted, but the amendment limits the leases to agricultural leases of irrigated lands, so that it covers allotments principally. It might in some instances cover small areas that had not been allotted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a question. I understand the gentleman to say that restrictions on alienation would expire in about twenty-one or twenty-two years.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. And that this limitation on the lease was twenty years, so as to bring it within that period.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Is there anything in the amendment that would prevent, eighteen years from now, the Secretary making a lease for twenty years from that date and thereby running it beyond?

Mr. MONDELL. I don't know that there is, but I do not imagine that the Secretary will make any leases beyond a period of nonalienation. I don't think there is any probability of that being done. If it were done, however, the gentleman is aware of the fact that the lands could be alienated in any event.

Mr. PADGETT. But then they would be alienated subject to this incumbrance of the lease.

Mr. MONDELL. I don't think there is any danger of that being done. Our idea was to bring the leasing period within the period of nonalienation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue a patent to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America for and covering the following-described lands, amounting to approximately 160 acres, now and for many years reserved for and occupied by the said board of missions as an Indian school, to wit: The northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 8, township 1 south, range 1 west of the Wind River meridian, on the Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming: Provided, That the said patent shall not issue until the Indians of the said reservation have given their consent to the grant through their business committee or council in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall provide.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a Department amendment sent up by the Secretary, and his letter of transmission is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 10, 1908.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference of February 5, 1908, of a copy of H. R. 16037, entitled "A bill granting certain lands in the Wind River Reservation, Wyo., to the Protestant Episcopal Church." You request a report thereon for the information of the committee.

The lands described in the bill, the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter, section 8, township 1 south, range 1 west, Wind River meridian, on the Wind River Reservation, have been occupied under proper authority of the Department for temporary missionary purposes by the Protestant Episcopal Church since 1888. However, they still form a part of the unceded Indian reservation, and would, in case the missionary work were abandoned, revert to the Indians thereof.

In view of the great benefit the church has rendered the Indians of the reservation named, and of the large amount of money expended in their behalf by that religious organization, it would seem that title in fee to the mission tracts should be given, as indicated.

As the bill provides that the consent of the Indians, through their business committee or council, shall be obtained before patents shall issue for the lands, it has my hearty approval, and should be enacted into law.

Very respectfully,

FRANK PIERCE,
Acting Secretary.

The lands in question have been occupied by the church in question for twenty years, and it is now proposed that title be given to the church, with a reversionary provision in case the church ever ceases to occupy the lands that they revert to the Indians. This is subject to the consent of the Indians in any event.

Mr. MANN. Is it something that the Indians are asking for?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is something the Indians originally consented to, that the church be given the occupancy of this little piece of land. The Department sent it up with the provision that it be subject to the assent of the Indians. Ordinarily the Indians are glad to have this sort of thing done. I do not know whether they have especially asked it in this case or not.

Mr. MANN. What does the church want with 168 acres of land?

Mr. SHERMAN. For buildings and probably a small farm. I am not sure but what they have a school upon this as well as a church and also a cemetery. The gentleman from Wyoming can probably explain.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in 1872, when General Grant apportioned the work on the Indian reservations among the various denominations, he apportioned the work on the Shoshone portion of this reservation to the Episcopal Church and on the Arapaho portion to the Catholic Church. The Arapahoes at that time had no head chief. Each denomination took possession of a quarter section of land assigned by the Indians. They erected their buildings and opened schools. In the case of the Arapahoes a provision of this kind was made in the bill some four or five years ago granting the Catholic Church the lands on which their school and church are established. The Episcopal people have been under the impression that they had a grant, owing to the fact that many years ago Chief Washakie, of the Shoshones, gave them what he and what they considered was a grant of the tract. As a matter of fact they have only their tract. They have expended thirty-five or forty thousand dollars in buildings and they conduct a splendid school. It is the only denominational school on this reservation.

The work is of vast benefit to the Indians and is highly prized by them, and the Indians have often stated to me that Brother Roberts should have his title confirmed in this land. Provision is made that the deed shall not issue until the Indians have given formal assent to it, and it gives them only the tract of land on which they now have their school and farm, and nearly all of that 160 acres is under a high state of cultivation, and the Indians are being taught the arts of agriculture, irrigation, and horticulture on that tract of land.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, on last Monday afternoon my colleague from Hudson County in this Chamber made some remarks derogatory of the conduct of Mr. William Jennings Bryan—

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I must raise the point of order that this section does not appropriate for William Jennings Bryan. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from New Jersey may have five minutes.

Mr. LEAKE. Mr. Chairman, I hope that request will prevail, and I hope that I may have five minutes in which to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from New Jersey have five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I object unless the other gentleman from New Jersey has five minutes extended to him.

Mr. SULZER. Too late.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEAKE] may have five minutes in which to reply.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I object, unless he gets on the other side of the aisle.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] by unanimous consent has been given five minutes and is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to state that I made an objection unless permission should be given to the other gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not rise until after the Chairman had announced unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My point of order is that this amendment was not disposed of. I was going to move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amendment to which the gentleman is speaking now. The gentleman from New Jersey is speaking by unanimous consent, and the gentleman's point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, now that the tempest which unintentionally, as far as I am concerned, was started by my taking the floor has somewhat abated, I trust the gentlemen will permit me to take my humble way in peace. A few days ago—last Monday afternoon, as I have stated—my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. LEAKE] took the floor for the purpose of criticising the conduct of William Jennings Bryan. My purpose in rising to-day is not to take issue or engage in an altercation with my colleague, with whom my relations are most cordial, but to assure this House, and through them the country, that the sentiments he expressed are not either the sentiments that I entertain or the sentiments that prevail in Hudson County, which we both represent [applause on the Democratic side], or which prevail, for that matter, throughout the State of New Jersey. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Bryan's conduct was criticised because he possesses a knowledge of the decalogue. Mr. Chairman, it is a most amazing view to be expressed in a legislative chamber, and I have had some experience in them, that a man is disqualified from the duties of statesmanship simply because he shows an acquaintance with the ten commandments. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Rather, Mr. Chairman, is it refreshing in these days to find a man who not only boasts and possesses an acquaintance with the Ten Commandments, but what is more, one who throughout the entire course of his public career has consistently put the precepts of the Commandments into practice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And while I concur unreservedly in the statement made, that his knowledge of the Commandments would fit him to occupy a pulpit with preeminence, I can also assure the House, reflecting at the same time the convictions of many here, that that same acquaintance will enable him to occupy with éclat the post of President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Twice, Mr. Chairman, has the same gentleman borne aloft Democracy's banner, and although the cause that he led went down into the dust of defeat, principles that he espoused were so undeniably sound that his victorious opponents have appropriated many of them and made them the popular features of their policy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is said that this gentleman is engaged in the practice of corralling the delegates for the Denver convention. Well, Mr. Chairman, without questioning the truth of this assertion, we can cheerfully admit that, if it is true, it is a practice for which we have a highly distinguished precedent, for if the reports current in the newspapers are any indication of the truth, it is the very same practice indulged in by the illustrious gentleman whom my friends on the other side of the Chamber boast of as their political chieftain. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Who will be the Democratic nominee no man can with certainty foretell. The choice will be left to the untrammeled judgment of the delegates to the Denver convention. Present indications, however, point strongly to Mr. Bryan.

And so, Mr. Chairman, my whole purpose to-day is to set myself, personally, and the section that I represent, in a correct attitude before the House and the nation on this important matter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks the privilege of inserting which in the RECORD I now ask the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILL. I desire for the information of my fellow Members to insert in the RECORD a report of some remarks uttered by Mr. Bryan at a recent banquet in Washington, which I trust will not be considered any the less valuable because they recognize the existence and validity of the decalogue which we all revere.

Speech made by Mr. Bryan at the dinner of the united Democracy of the District of Columbia at the Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C., on November 26, 1907.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Toastmaster and Fellow-Democrats: I desire, in the first place, to express my obligation to the Democrats of the District of Columbia, the united Democracy, for the opportunity they have given me to meet so many of the faithful in this part of the country. I want to thank, also, the toastmaster for his more than complimentary words in presenting me to you.

If anyone ever says that republics are ungrateful, I am prepared to testify that this Republic has rewarded me far more than I deserve, for my own experience has shown how much people are willing to do for one who has nothing to offer them in return except a desire to see realized in government the principles laid down by the fathers. I think my own experience in this country teaches this lesson, at least, to the young men, that they can expect reward for all that they try to do, for I have been more than abundantly rewarded for my endeavors. When I hear words spoken as they have been spoken to-night, I feel that to sit and listen to them may to some of you suggest the question, "How can he allow the praise to go unanswered?" But one in public life has to be overpraised by his friends in order to make up for the abuse that he gets from his enemies. [Laughter and applause.]

And so when mean Republicans say mean things about me, instead of getting mad, I shall just recall what has been said at this banquet, and smile and think I am still ahead. It is the fate of those who stand in the position of leadership to receive the credit that really belongs to those who labor with them, and for eleven years I have been trying to unload upon those who have been my faithful colaborers a large part of the praise that has been given to me.

A gentleman came out to Lincoln a year ago—Senator BEVERIDGE by name [laughter]—and made a speech before the Republican Club, and he called me a dreamer. He said that the President did things, but that I only dreamed. Well, I did not pay much attention to what he said; but in a little while I read that Speaker CANNON called me a dreamer, and then I sat up and took notice. [Laughter.] A few days later I read that Governor Cummings called me a dreamer. Then it began to look serious. [Laughter.] Not long after that Governor

Hanly called me a dreamer—four—and I know that my poor word would amount to little against the testimony of four great men; so I decided to plead guilty and justify. Then I began to look up the subject of dreaming, and, as usual, I went to the Bible, for I have a habit of going to the Bible when I get into trouble. [Applause.] It is the best book I know of. [Applause.] I know of no other book that contains so much truth or truth so well expressed; and then I was rather driven to it besides. I used to quote a good deal from Democratic authority, but I found when I quoted a Democrat that the Republicans would attack my authority, and they kept me busy defending the Democrats from whom I quoted. [Laughter.]

So I made up my mind to quote my Bible; and when I quote Scripture and Republicans attack my authority, I just let them fight it out with the Bible and I go on about my business.

I went back to the Bible and I found that the Bible spoke of dreamers. Joseph was the most conspicuous dreamer. You remember that Joseph told his dreams and that his brethren hated him because of his dreams; and once when his father sent him out where they were keeping their flocks in Dothan they saw him coming afar off and they said, "Here comes the dreamer," and then they plotted to kill him; and he was not the last dreamer plotted against. Finally, they said, "No, we will not kill him; we will put him down in a deep pit. We will make the father believe that the wild beasts have devoured him." And then the merchants came along and bought him. They carried him down into Egypt, and the brethren said, "Now we are through with that dreamer; we are rid of him." And the year passed, and famine came in the land, and they had to go down into Egypt to buy corn, and when they got there [applause; and a voice "They found Bryan."] they found Joseph and Joseph had the corn. [Laughter and applause.] I made up my mind that it is not so bad to be a dreamer, after all, if you have the corn. [Laughter and applause.]

But the more I studied the subject of dreams the bigger the dreamer became. John Boyle O'Reilly says that the dreamer lives forever, while the toiler dies in a day. Go into Europe and you will find great cathedrals, and back of every great cathedral there was a great dreamer, a man who had a vision of a great temple of worship. He put his vision upon paper, and then the multitude began with brick and stone and mortar to realize his dream, and sometimes hundreds of years after the dreamer's death the temple would be completed, and then people would go from all corners of the earth to look upon the building, and the dreamer's name would be known, while the toilers would be forgotten. [Applause.]

I do not deserve to stand among the dreamers. It is too great a distinction; but there was a statesman-dreamer—Thomas Jefferson was the world's greatest dreamer. [Great applause.] He saw a people oppressed, and he had a vision of a self-governing nation, where every citizen was a sovereign, and where no one dared or cared to wear a crown; and he put that dream upon paper. For more than a century the toiling millions have been building at the structure whose plans he drew—not only here but throughout the world they are building—not only in civilized countries, but in semicivilized countries, all over this globe, will you find people building away at this structure. Some day it will be completed, and then it will bring blessings to every human being. I shall be content if when my days are numbered it can be said of me, not that I was a dreamer and in the class with Jefferson, but that I was a toiler, laboring as best I could, improving every opportunity that presented itself, to advance the work on this building that he dreamed into existence. [Loud applause.]

I have enjoyed the speeches that have been made to-night. I have especially enjoyed the speech made by the distinguished Democrat from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is the recognized leader of the minority in the House. [Applause.] What difference does it make if we do not agree on some questions? I long since have learned that there can not be absolute harmony among any considerable number of people, if they think at all. If you want absolute harmony in a party you must not have more than one person in it, and then you must take the vote immediately, for he may change his mind. [Laughter and applause.] If you have two you are bound to have discord, for one will be radical and the other conservative. [Laughter.] There are as many different shades of radicalism and conservatism in this country as there are people. Speak to the most radical man in the country, and he will tell you that there are 80,000,000 of conservatives; speak to the most conservative and he will tell you there are 80,000,000 of dangerous radicals in the country. [Laughter.] In Japan I saw standing by a temple door two Korean lions; it is quite a familiar scene there, for these lions are found in front of many temples. One has his mouth open, the other has his shut. They represent the eternal conflict between the positive and the negative; between the conservative and the radical; and both are necessary. If it were not for the conservative, the radical would go too fast, and if it were not for the radical the conservative would not go at all. [Laughter.] They help each other; both are necessary in every country. I was so struck with the appearance of these lions and with their significance that I bought two and brought them home with me; I put them on either side of the steps leading up to my front door, and there they stand, the radical and the conservative; and I go in and out about halfway between the two every day. [Laughter and applause.]

I enjoyed listening to the speeches that have been made here, and particularly that made by my good friend from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], to whom I always listen with delight, and not less to that of my good friend from New York [Mr. SULZER], who, in 1896, was much more lonesome down there than he is to-day. [Applause.] And I appreciate, too, the speech made by the Tammany leader [Mr Hagan], who comes here with his message from the unterrified Democracy of New York City; and I am perfectly willing to indorse his statement that the Tammany tiger is a much more beautiful toy than any "Teddy bear." [Applause.] His reference to these political toys recalls the emblems of the two parties, and, my friends, I am prepared now to defend the donkey as an emblem for a party in preference to the elephant. I had this impressed upon my mind as I traveled through other countries. Go where you will, and you will find the donkey, and he is always at work, and he is working for the common people wherever you find him. [Applause and laughter.] He is no aristocrat. [Laughter and applause.] He is not ashamed of toil. You will find him in the mountains of the West; you will find him in the crowded sections of the Orient; you will find him along the fertile Valley of the Nile, and you will find him on the sacred soil of the Holy Land. And that patient, persistent animal is always doing something for the people. If service is the measure of greatness, the donkey's claim to distinction can not be ignored. [Laughter.] Aye, give me as a party emblem the universal donkey rather than the elephant, which can only be found in a few latitudes, and is seldom seen except on dress parade. [Applause.]

I desire to call your attention to-night to a subject of importance, one worthy of our consideration, and if I did not regard it as an important subject I would not trespass upon your time at this late hour of the evening.

I appreciate the growth of Democratic ideas. You may remember that I have pointed this out at various times—reluctantly, of course, but from a sense of duty. [Laughter.] I have felt that I ought to speak of it. [Laughter.] Some Democrats have criticised me because I have praised the President when he has been Democratic; but, my friends, no Republican President can push me off of the Democratic platform if I know it. [Applause and laughter.] I have not enjoyed myself so much in years as I have enjoyed myself in the last three, and I think I am enjoying myself to-day better than I did last year. Why, my friends, you don't know how much better I am treated now since my ideas have been made respectable. [Laughter and applause.]

I used to be afraid to let the picture papers come into my house. They had such horrid caricatures that they kept my family disturbed all the time, but now I can let nearly any paper come into the house, they are so much more polite. Collier's Weekly not long ago had a cartoon that some of you may have seen. Why, it actually represented me as a bird. Think of it! [Laughter.] You laugh, but after a man has been in the serpent class for years it is quite a rise to get among the birds. [Laughter and applause.] And this cartoon represented the President and myself both as birds. [Laughter.] But he was on the nest, and I was on the limb; and the strangest part of the picture was that his nest was feathered with feathers that I had formerly worn. [Laughter and applause.] There I stood on that limb almost naked, with just one feather left—tariff reform—and I was wondering whether he was going to take that. [Laughter.] Now, the cartoon brought out the idea, but it did me great injustice, for I have more than one feather left and others growing. [Laughter and applause.] And I am perfectly willing to raise feathers if the President will only have the good sense to use them. [Laughter and applause.]

The President has advocated some things that are Democratic, and I want to call your attention to-night very briefly to some of the things that he has advocated that are Democratic, and to some things that are Democratic that he has not advocated, and to some un-Democratic things that he has advocated.

In the first place, he has advocated the regulation of the railroads. That is Democratic. Only he has not gone as far as we think he ought to go. He has, to some extent, prosecuted the trusts. That is Democratic; but he has not prosecuted enough of them or carried the prosecutions as far as he ought to have carried them. We have had on the statute books a law making it a criminal offense, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, for men to conspire in restraint of trade. He has been President now for some six years, and while he has commenced some prosecutions, we have yet to see the penitentiary doors open for a trust magnate; the birth rate is larger than the death rate, and the trust family is one family that meets the President's idea of size. [Laughter and applause.] But so far as he has gone on the trust question he is Democratic. As the Republican leaders would not go as far as he wanted to go on the railroad question, so they have not been willing to go as far as he wanted to go on the trust question. He has advocated the arbitration of differences between labor and capital, and this is Democratic; but the Republican leaders have not joined him in it. He has advocated an income tax, and this is Democratic, but no prominent Republican has yet attempted to carry out his recommendation; and Secretary Taft, who has been selected as his heir-apparent, if the Roosevelt line is established, says that while he is in favor of an income tax, he does not want it just now. Now, here are four things that are Democratic; the President has advocated these Democratic policies which the Democratic party advocated for from five to twelve years before he ever spoke upon the subjects. Now, I want to give him credit, and I do gladly give him credit for what he has done in this respect. If you ask me if he is a Democrat, out of justice to him and out of justice to the Democratic party I say, No. [Laughter.]

If you ask me if he is Democratic, I will answer you after the manner of the old pioneer preacher of Illinois, Peter Cartwright. He was asked if he was sanctified, and he replied, "Yes, in spots."

And so, my friends, if you ask if the President is a Democrat, I say, "Yes, in spots." My only regret is that the spots are not as numerous as they ought to be or as large as I would like to see them. But a Democratic spot looks beautiful to me, I do not care on whom I see it. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, there are certain things that are Democratic that he has not advocated. He has not advocated tariff reform. That is Democratic, and I am sorry that he has not taken the Democratic position.

He has not advocated the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, yet this Democratic reform is so popular that five times the House of Representatives has passed the resolution necessary for the submission of the amendment and has passed it by practically a unanimous vote. That is a Democratic policy that he has not advocated.

He has not yet joined us in the denunciation of government by injunction, although the indications are favorable. [Laughter.] I say "favorable" because in the last message he said that if this injunction—this writ of injunction—continued to be abused, something would have to be done. This reminds me of a man who went to a theater on a pass. It was a very bad play, and the audience began to hiss and to hoot, but he sat still. Finally one went to him and said: "Why don't you join us in expressions of disapproval? You certainly do not like this play." "No," he answered, "I don't like it any better than you do, but I am in here on a pass. But," he added, "if this thing gets much worse, I will go out and buy a ticket and come in, and then I will join with you." [Laughter and applause.]

Neither has he indorsed the Democratic opposition to imperialism.

Now, not only are there some Democratic things that he has not advocated, but there are some very un-Democratic things that he has advocated. In the first place, he has advocated the national incorporation of railroads and other corporations engaged in interstate commerce. This is un-Democratic. It is Hamiltonian. It is the most centralizing proposition that has been presented to this country since Hamilton presented his consolidated, centralized plan of government. This is un-Democratic, and I am sure that the Democratic party will be unitedly opposed to it, and I trust that we can get enough Republicans to join with us to prevent its consummation.

This idea of a centralized government, my friends, was illustrated in his action in regard to the school question in California. That was entirely in line with this idea of a centralized government that overrides the rights of the various States.

Then, he has advocated a ship subsidy, and this is un-Democratic. And we not only had the solid Democratic party against it, but we had enough Republicans from the interior States to make it certain that this year, with their reduced majority, they can not pass it through the House.

He has also advocated an asset currency, and so far the Democrats have had enough assistance from the Republicans to prevent that being carried through. He has, too, given evidence of possessing a military spirit, which is un-Democratic.

I mention some of the Democratic things he has indorsed, some Democratic things that he has failed to indorse, and some un-Democratic things that he has indorsed, because I believe that the Democrats should praise him where he deserves praise and should censure him where he deserves censure. I believe that we as Democrats should be as ready to commend him when he does anything right as we are to condemn him when he does anything wrong. [Applause.] And because I have felt free to say a good word for him where he said a good word for a Democratic idea, I have felt free to point out what I believe to be the errors in his policies. I have thought it worth while to go somewhat into detail on this; and now, my friends, I want to come to the question that I desire to impress upon your minds to-night.

I am going to assume that Democratic ideas have been vindicated. I am going to assume that the last eleven years have shown such a vindication of the correctness of Democratic principles as has not been shown in the vindication of any party in the same length of time in all the history of this country. Eleven years ago the Republican party came into power in all the Departments of the Government. It has had eleven years of complete supremacy. It has had the President, the Senate, and the House—and the Supreme Court thrown in for good measure. It could do everything it wanted to do. It could pass every law it wanted to pass; repealed every law it wanted to repeal, and enforce every law that it wanted to enforce. There has been nothing to hinder. Not only has it had supreme power, but it has been aided from without as few parties have been aided. When the Republican party came into power we were in an era of falling prices and rising dollars.

Immediately after the election there were such unprecedented discoveries of gold throughout the world that the quantity of gold now produced annually is larger than the product of gold and silver both in 1896. In the last eleven years we have had such an increase in the volume of money that to-day we have more than 50 per cent per capita more than we had in 1896, although Republican leaders then said we had enough; and with this enormous increase has come a rise in prices, and with that rise in prices has come greater prosperity. This country to-day could not commence to do the business that it is doing if we had no more money in circulation than we had in 1896. [Applause.] It has had the credit for these rising prices because the rising prices came under a Republican Administration, although the Republican party can not claim credit for the increased discoveries of gold. Not only has it had this advantage, but when it came into power we were at the end of an era of bad crops. For eleven years we have had an era of large crops—large crops, higher prices, more money, and, consequently, more prosperity—and yet this Republican party, in complete power, aided by all these things for which it can not honestly claim credit—this Republican party has gone down in popularity from a time when it claimed that almost any Republican could be elected until to-day, when Republican leaders are demanding that the President shall break the precedent of a hundred years and be a candidate again, not to save his country, but to save his party from threatened defeat. [Applause.]

Is it not strange that a party thus in power should thus fall in popularity? And is it not stranger still that the one man who is regarded as popular by his own people is only popular in proportion as he has abandoned the Republican position and adopted the Democratic position? [Applause.] Eleven years in power and the Republican party has not impressed upon this country one single Republican policy. Not one single Republican policy is as strong to-day as it was eleven years ago. The Democratic party, out of power, is strong enough to fashion the policies of a Republican President. This party in defeat has exercised more power and influence than the Republican party in the full possession of the Government. [Loud applause.]

This demonstrates the truth of what Mr. West has said, that you can not kill the Democratic party, because you can not kill the things for which it stands. The Democratic party is strong to-day because its principles are strong, and its principles have grown because they are right. How do you attempt to explain the fact that the Democratic party can look further ahead than the Republican party—can see more clearly the abuses that need to be remedied and measure more accurately than the Republican party the needs of the people? Why is it? It is a question that must arise in the mind of every reasonable man. I want to give you, if I can, the explanation; I want to give you the explanation that, to my mind, is not only a sufficient explanation, but the only explanation.

It is altogether due to the point of view. There are just two points of view when you come to consider government. One is the aristocratic point of view and the other is the democratic point of view. In the beginning of our nation's history we had two great men, and they looked at the Government from these two points of view. Hamilton was an aristocrat; Jefferson was a democrat. Hamilton did not trust the people; Jefferson did trust the people. Hamilton was afraid that the "passions of the mob" would control the Government, and, therefore, he wanted to get it as far from them as possible and have the elections as far apart as he could make them. Jefferson trusted the people, and believed that that government was best which was closest to the people. He was not afraid of the influence of the people upon their own government, for he declared that if the people could not be trusted with their own government there was no power to which God had committed the right to govern them. The ideas of Hamilton were overthrown; the ideas of Jefferson triumphed. Hamilton wanted a government in which the President would be elected for life; in which the Senators would be elected for life, and in which the governors of the various States would be appointed by the Federal Government for life. Who would dare to go out as a candidate for high office now on Hamilton's platform?

Who would dare to go out and ask to have the President elected for life, the Senate elected for life, and the governors appointed by the Federal Government for life? No one would think of going before the country on such a platform. The question is not a President for life, but a President for a third term, and even those who want him for a third term try to avoid the force of the argument against it by saying that it is only a second "elective" term. If even his own friends recognize the objection to even a third term, who would declare in favor of a President for life? And who would want the Senate elected for life? The most popular reform in this country is the one that is intended to bring the Senate into harmony with the House in its method of election and make it more representative of the people.

A VOICE. That is it.

Mr. BRYAN. And if you think we would like to have governors appointed from Washington for life ask these Representatives from Oklahoma, whose coming has given joy to all our hearts. Ask them what they think of a carpetbag government in Oklahoma, where the officials are appointed from Washington, not for life, but only for a period of a year, and you will find the sentiment unanimous against the Hamiltonian idea and in favor of the Jeffersonian doctrine. But, my friends, this difference in the point of view between the democrat and the aristocrat not only manifests itself when you come to consider the theory of government and the methods of government, but it manifests itself also when you come to consider the structure of society and the application of political principles to the public welfare.

There is a Democratic view of society, and there is a Republican view. I say "Republican," and perhaps I ought to say aristocratic, and yet the Republican leaders of this country take the aristocratic view of society. They take the Hamiltonian view of government, and they take the aristocratic view of society. The Democrats believe that society is built from the bottom; the aristocratic idea is that society is suspended from the top. [Laughter.] The Democratic view is that if you legislate to make the people prosperous, then all those smaller classes that rest upon the people will share in the people's prosperity. But the aristocrat says, "Legislate for the well to do, and prosperity will leak through on those below." [Laughter.] That is the difference in the view point. You can not get any man to admit that he is an aristocrat, but you can prove it on him if you can get him to state his views in regard to public questions. If I want to find out whether a man is an aristocrat or not, I tell him a Bible story, and then listen to hear what comment he makes. I tell him the story of Lazarus and Dives, how Lazarus ate the crumbs that fell from Dives's table; if he is a Democrat he says, "It is too bad that we have any people who must live on crumbs," and he begins to plan for some reform which he thinks will give to every man a table of his own, so that no one will be dependent upon what falls from another man's table. [Loud applause.]

But if he is an aristocrat, what does he say? He says, "What a lucky thing it was for Lazarus that there was a Dives near." [Applause.]

Now, this is no imaginary illustration. You will find this illustration borne out in daily life. You will find people among you who are aristocratic, and they are always talking about "the captains of industry." They are eulogizing the men who give work to others, and these men who think society is constructed from the top think that the laboring man ought to make every day a Thanksgiving and express his gratitude that somebody gives him a chance to work, and yet the employer will not employ a man unless that man produces enough to not only pay his own wages but give his employer a profit for employing him. When the steel trust made public its last annual report that report showed that it paid to labor $147,000,000, while its net earnings were $154,000,000. Its employees, on an average, not only earned their own wages, but they earned more than a hundred per cent profit on their wages for the benevolent corporation that employed them, and yet those who think that society is constructed from the top insist that every man who works for a corporation ought to allow that corporation to dictate to him what he should do in the discharge of his duty as a citizen.

In the campaign of 1896 I believe that we lost enough by the coercion practiced by these corporations to change the result of that election. We met them on the stump and defeated them by argument; we put unpaid voters against their mercenaries, paid by the largest campaign fund that was ever collected in this country, but, in spite of their subsidized press, in spite of their corruption fund, we would have won this fight but for the fact that the day before election they were able to coerce enough laboring men to change defeat into victory. [Applause.]

It depends upon the point of view from which you examine society what remedies you will suggest. If you will examine the policies of these two great parties you will find that the Democratic party has been trying to secure reforms in the interest of all the people, while the Republican party has been legislating in the interest of a few who control the great industries.

Take, for instance, the trust question. What is the position of the Democratic party? It says that 80,000,000 people are victimized by these private monopolies, and because it looks at the question from the view point of all the people, it says that a private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. It says that God never made a man good enough to stand at the head of a private monopoly and decide every day a question where his interests are on the one side and the interests of all the people on the other side. The Republican leaders are taking the side of the trust magnate. They said, in the first place, that there were no trusts, and when we brought proof of the existence of these trusts, they said: "Well, they are natural developments; they are in the line of economic progress and have come to stay;" and when we showed that they were not economic, but political; that they rested upon laws and could be destroyed by laws; when we showed that a private monopoly had its source in legislation, and that legislation could take away the foundation upon which it rested; when they could not longer defend it, they said: "This is a new question and you must not be too hasty about it; you must be deliberate and must take time to consider." Call it a new question! Why, the principle of private monopoly has manifested itself from the very dawn of history. It is merely one of the manifestations of selfishness that has been found in man from the beginning. Go back through the years and you will find instances of it.

I found when I was in the Holy Land that there was an oil monopoly there seventeen hundred years ago. You will find an account of it in the works of Josephus. He says that a man named John of Gashala got a monopoly in olive oil; and if any of you think that the rebate is the only foundation of monopoly, let me remind you that when John of Gashala got his monopoly in olive oil he had no rebates to help him. He filled two goatskins, and strapped them over the back of a donkey, and yet he raised the price of olive oil until he sold it for ten times what he paid for it; and I have sometimes wondered whether our John got his first idea of an oil trust from John of Gashala.

It is not a new idea. It is an old idea, and the reason why the Democratic party is advocating remedies that the people are beginning to accept is to be found in the fact that the Democratic party looks at the question from the standpoint of all the people, while the Republican party looks at it from the standpoint of these men who attempt to control the industries of the country and then dole out wages to the rest of the people. I am willing to go down on my knees at morning and say to my Heavenly Father, "Give us this day our daily bread," but God forbid that I should compel millions of my countrymen to go down on their knees at morning and say to these trust magnates, "Give us this day our daily bread," and have them reply, "We will if you will vote the ticket we want you to." [Applause.]

Take the tariff question. What is the difference in the position of the parties? Merely a difference in the point of view. The Democratic party looks at eighty millions of consumers who are paying tribute to a small proportion of the population; and the Republican leaders pick out these few men who are supposed to be of superior importance, and insist that these men shall have a right to make the Government a business asset and collect through the Treasury Department the money that they say they ought to have in return for the service that they claim to render to the country.

I have outlined every argument which has been made in favor of a high tariff. When I began to speak on this subject twenty-seven years ago, when I was not quite old enough to vote, the argument that I heard made was "we must have the high tariff for a little while to help the infant industries until they can get upon their feet." But in a little while they got so big that they could not only stand on their own feet, but walk all over everybody's else feet; and then they had to drop that argument. Then what did they say? Why, they said that we must have this tariff, not for a little while for infants, but all the time for adults, but that we must have just enough to cover the difference in the cost of labor here and abroad. And under the pretense that they were getting just enough to cover the difference in the cost of the labor here and abroad, they got a tariff that was on an average more than twice as much as the entire amount paid to labor. And yet these men, who think society is constructed from the top, have made no move toward the revision of the tariff. I confess I can not understand how the American people have been deceived so long by the false and flimsy arguments that have been advanced in favor of a high tariff.

Go out among the people, and in most cases Democrats and Republicans can not be told one from the other. They mingle in society; they mingle in the church; they intermarry, and you will find them together about every fireside. They make their wills just alike. You can not go to a court-house and tell by the will recorded whether the man who made it was a Democrat or a Republican. The amount that he left might give you some indication, but the language of the will would not. You will find that when a Republican makes a will he counts up how much he has, then he leaves so much to one child and so much to another child and so much to another. He goes through the list, and he says just how much each child is to receive. But if a Republican made a will like he votes on the tariff question he would leave all his money to one child, and then tell the child that he hoped that that child would treat the other children fairly in the distribution. These men who will not trust their own children to be just to their brothers and sisters leave hundreds of millions of dollars to protected manufacturers of the country, and then trust them to divide it generously with the employees.

How are we to get tariff reform? From the Republicans? Why, they say the tariff must be reformed by its friends. Who are its friends? Those who think they make money out of it. And how long will it be before the men who think they make money out of a high tariff are willing to reduce the amount of money that they make? It is a vain hope, my friends. A child will get so big that it will be ashamed to nurse, and a calf will grow so large that it will finally wean itself, but no protected industry ever let go the public teat until it was pulled away by force.

They now say that we must have tariff reform after the next election. That is the position of Secretary Taft—not before the election, but afterwards. Well, there are just two times when the tariff can be reformed: One time is just before the election, and the other is just afterwards; and, unfortunately, these happen to be exactly the two times when the Republican party finds it impossible to reform the tariff. [Laughter and applause.] It can not be done just before the election, for that might interfere with a Republican victory, and if it wins the victory it can not do it just after the election, for that would be like flying in the face of the verdict that the people had rendered. It is only when they think they must do something, or somebody else will, that they become at all frightened, and begin to talk of even remote tariff reform. And when Secretary Taft says that we will have tariff reform after the election I am reminded of a story Senator TAYLOR tells.

I do not want to tell his stories in advance, but he has so many that he will not miss this one. It was a story of an old colored man who became very sick. He thought he was going to die, and his wife asked him if everything was clear between him and his Maker. And he said, "No; as I look up toward heaven I can see ducks and chickens and pigs and things of that kind crossing between me and the skies." She said, "I told you not to do it. We have some of them yet, and I will go out and get them together and we will send them back, and maybe you will feel easier." And he said, "Go out and get them and hurry up." So she hitched up the old mule, and just as she was about to start away to distribute the stolen goods she looked in to see how he was; he heard her and asked: "Have you sent them yet?" She said, "No; but they are just ready to go." And he said, "Never mind now, I am feeling better."

If they can get you past the election by the promise of tariff reform they will feel so much better that they will forget all about reform. If you have tariff reform at all it will come from the eighty millions of consumers and not from the few protected industries that have been fattening through public taxation.

And so if you take up the question of centralization you will find that it is a question of the point of view. The Republicans—why are they for centralization? Because the great corporations of this country want to get the power out of the hands of the States, for the governments of the States are too near the people. They want to get the Government farther away. They would rather have it in Washington than in the States, and if they could get it to London they would feel safer still. The farther they can get it away from home the better they feel about it; while the Democrats, trusting the people and looking at the question from the standpoint of the people, want to keep the Government near to the people. Democrats insist, therefore, that Federal remedies shall be added to State remedies and not substituted for State remedies. [Applause.]

Why is it that the Republicans have put off arbitration? It is because they take the views of the great monopolies that do not want arbitration. Why do the Democrats favor arbitration? Because they look at if from the standpoint of the army of employees and also from the standpoint of all the people, who are disturbed by every conflict between labor and capital. We have just witnessed a fight between two great telegraph companies and their employees, and 80,000,000 of people have had their business interrupted while these employers have fought out their differences with their employees. If you ask them to arbitrate, they say there is nothing to arbitrate, and then they ask you, "Has not a man a right to attend to his own business?" and that question has fooled many a well-meaning man. My reply is this: If a man in attending to his own business affects only himself, he has a right to attend to his own business; but when a man in attempting to attend to what he calls his business affects the lives and happiness and the future of tens of thousands of his fellow-citizens, I deny that any man has, under such circumstances, a right to attend to his business in an arbitrary way. [Applause.]

And the same difference in point of view explains the difference between the two parties on the subject of government by injunction; and this difference in the point of view explains the difference between these parties on the subject of imperialism. The Republican leaders are looking for trade purchased at the cannon's mouth, and because they think that a few great commercial interests will be able to profit by imperialism they are willing to trample upon the principles of our Government. The Democratic party, looking at the question from the standpoint of the masses who pay the taxes and whose sons must die in the support of a colonial policy, are opposed to a colonial policy in this country.

We insisted seven years ago that the Republican party define its position and tell this country what it intended to do. It refused then. The leaders said, "We can not talk to these people when they have guns in their hands." They said, "Let them lay down their arms and then we will talk to them." And when the Filipinos laid down their arms they said that there was nothing to talk about, and we have not been able to get them to discuss the question of imperialism from that time to this, and yet they have spent more than five hundred millions of dollars in this attempt to ape the monarchies of the Old World—five hundred millions of money collected from the people has been squandered on this colonial experiment.

At a meeting at St. Louis not long ago to discuss the development of interior waterways they declared that $500,000,000 spent in improving the interior waterways would give us an annual saving of $180,000,000 in the cost of transportation. Yet, my friends, we have spent more than $500,000,000 on our imperial policy, and instead of having an income of $180,000,000 we have more than $100,000,000 a year increase in the expenses of our Army and our Navy. We have more than twice as many soldiers to-day as we had ten years ago, and they can not justify the increase except on the ground of our colonial possessions. This has increased our Navy, and still naval experts tell us that if we do not make our Navy three times as large as it is now the "Japs will get us if we don't watch out."

I took a short vacation in southern Idaho last summer; I stayed for a week on the banks of the Snake River. I had been out there ten years before and had crossed a piece of desert upon which I never expected to see a crop growing; but within the past ten years they have put a dam across the Snake River; they have built great canals; they have reclaimed 170,000 acres of that land, and where three years ago nothing but sagebrush grew to-day they are raising 7 tons of alfalfa to the acre and a hundred bushels of oats. They have 10,000 people living there; they have one city with 1,910 inhabitants, and in it are three banks, which have deposits of more than half a million dollars. And yet, my friends, this great improvement has cost, I think, less than $6,000,000. They are now building canals on the other side of the river, and within three years they will have 150,000 acres, and they have another reclamation scheme not far away that is now being developed by which 150,000 acres more will be brought under irrigation. Within ten years you will see 30,000 people living on this land that was but a little while ago a desert. Think of it! Thirty thousand people, and the entire cost will be less than $25,000,000; and yet the Republican party has spent more than forty times that much on its colonial experiment, and there will never be as many Americans go to the Philippine Islands in a thousand years under a carpetbag government as are now making "the desert to blossom like the rose" in Idaho. Five hundred million dollars would reclaim every acre of arid land; $500,000,000 would construct dams to hold waste waters in the mountains, and not only protect the valleys from overflow in the spring, but give us this water to make the land productive. Yet the Republican party, looking at this question not from the standpoint of the common people, but from the standpoint of the favored few, even to-day refuses to announce its policy upon this important question.

And so I might take up each question upon which we have been divided, upon which our parties take different positions.

It is not strange that the Democratic party should be opposed to these great campaign contributions that have corrupted our politics. I can join with Mr. SULZER in what he says in praise of the work that Hon. Perry Belmont has done in bringing this subject to the attention of the American people. [Applause.] And if any Republican says that the Democrats have a selfish interest in stopping these campaign contributions, I reply that the Democratic party can get them whenever it will sell itself as the Republican party has sold itself; but rather than enter into this rivalry, rather than to put these elections upon an auction block and sell the Administration to the highest bidder, we prefer to appeal to the conscience of the American people, to pass laws that will prevent this corruption of politics by first stopping contributions from corporations entirely and then by compelling individual contributions above a reasonable minimum to be made known before the election, that the voters may know what money is being spent, and then they will know why it is being spent and what to expect from the party through which it is being spent.

I wish I could take up each question and show you that the viewpoint of the Democratic party is that of the common people and the viewpoint of the Republican party is that of the favored few. But let me say to you that the President has done one thing for which I feel especially grateful; he has called attention to swollen fortunes. I think I have enjoyed what he has said on this subject even more than any Republican has, because I am only cussed half as much now since he bears the other half. [Laughter.] We are now companions in misery. [Laughter.]

From the high position which the Executive occupies he has called attention to the fact that we have fortunes in this country which are unearned, that are diseased, that are abnormal, that are swollen. He has not only called attention to it, but he has stimulated some of the Republican leaders—some, not many—to a discussion of this subject. Senator BEVERIDGE was quoted last fall as saying out in Indiana that it was time to put a limit to the amount of money that one man could have. Why, it shocks my conservative mind to think of "putting a limit to thrift and industry" like that. I remember what they used to say when I talked about unearned fortunes. A hundred millions! That is Senator BEVERIDGE's limit. Possibly most of us will not feel that it is a personal attack upon us. A hundred millions! Do you know what that means? Why, the President gets fifty thousand a year, and I think it is enough, although the President bears a heavier load of responsibility than rests upon any other official in the world. If he serves four years, he earns $200,000; if he serves eight years, he earns four hundred thousand. If he forgets all that the forefathers have taught against a third term and serves ten years, he will make a half million. He would have to serve a hundred years to make five million, and then he would have to have twenty lives and serve a hundred years in each life to make a hundred millions. We say when we read that a railroad president or insurance company president gets $100,000 a year that it is a very big salary for one man.

But if a man was elected president of a railroad or insurance company at 21 and served for fifty years at a hundred thousand a year—served until he was 71—he would only make $5,000,000. He would have to have more than twice as many lives as a cat and serve fifty years in each life to make a hundred million dollars, and yet we have one man who is said to have $500,000,000. I am glad the President has called attention to this subject, for, my friends, when the people understand what is going on they will inquire the cause, and when they inquire the cause they will find that these swollen fortunes rest upon the favoritism and the privileges that the Republican leaders have been giving to a few men, because they look at society as if it were built from the top. [Applause.] And when the people have been aroused by the arguments of the President and those who act with him we shall propose to them the only permanent remedy for swollen fortunes. It may not reach the ones still in existence, and for those the inheritance tax may be good, but our plan will furnish a permanent remedy. We say, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." We say, open the door of opportunity to every man's son, and give each one an equal chance, not only to labor, but to enjoy the fruits of his toil, and when all are given the same opportunity and protected by the same laws, then we will have no swollen fortunes to menace this country by their corrupting influence. And how shall we bring this about? I am convinced that to-day a large majority of the people believe in Democratic principles. All that we have to do is to convince them that the Democratic party can be trusted to carry out Democratic principles.

This crisis through which we are passing is going to be the last argument necessary to convince the country of the correctness of our position. Year after year they have dragged out that old fraudulent argument that they have no panics when the Republicans are in power, that panics come only when Democrats are in power, and now in the very midst of Republican rule we have a financial stringency that reaches to the remotest corners of this land. I will not blame the President as some of his own party have blamed him. I will not blame the banks that have felt justified in the measures they have taken for the protection of their resources and that of the community, but I say to you that the Republican party, which boasts it has been in power, with only two years' exception, for forty-seven years, for this party does boast of that—in all that time we have had but two years when we had the President, the Senate, and the House all at one time—this Republican party which has been in power all this time which has drawn the salaries and had the glory—this Republican party must bear the responsibility; and I charge that these Republican leaders [applause] have so linked us to Wall street that when a gambler down there gets cold the whole country must shiver until that man is warmed. [Applause.] Now, while this extremity is upon us, the only remedy that these Republican leaders propose is a remedy that will put us more completely in the clutches of these very people. You hear them discuss remedies. Do they give you any remedy for keeping directors from robbing their own banks? No. Do they give you any remedy that will keep these men from loaning money on gambling securities to advance speculative enterprises? No. Do they insist that a larger percentage of the reserves shall be kept in the vault? No. Their only remedy is to enlarge the banks' power to issue the money; to give the bank power to issue on its variable assets. Was not my 50-cent dollar bad enough? Must we have a dollar with no cents behind it at all? [Applause.]

I am so glad that at last I can be the champion of "an honest dollar." [Applause.] I am glad that I can plead for "the widow and the orphan, whose savings must not be jeopardized," and for "the laborer, in whose hands the dollar must not diminish in its purchasing power." Their only remedy is a remedy that hires a few trustees to guard the interests of the people, and then they give the people no law to compel their guardians to execute the trust. The Democratic party looks at this question from the standpoint of the people, and says that what you need in this country is to restore confidence. Aye, I, the victim of confidence a few years ago, am now the evangel of confidence to-day. [Applause.] We say that what we want is confidence, and confidence where? Confidence among the depositors who have been frightened by the manner in which the great banks of the cities have been managed, and not until confidence is restored among the masses of the people will you find a permanent relief from this panic, and prevention of similar panics in the future. But, my friends, my time is up, and I must now go to catch a train. I appreciate——

A VOICE (interrupting). Go ahead.

A VOICE. We'll stay here all night.

Mr. BRYAN. I appreciate the honor that you have done me in coming out to-night. I can not sufficiently thank these good Democrats of the District of Columbia for the interest that they have shown.

Let me say one parting word. I can not say now who may be the candidate of our party next year. [Cries of "Bryan!" and applause.] The party owes me nothing. It has amply paid me for all that I have ever been able to do for it. There can be but one reason why the party should nominate me, and I do not want it to nominate me for any other reason; and this question must be determined by the voters of the party. The only possible excuse that can be made for my nomination is, not that it will help me, but that it will enable me to help the Democratic party in the fight that it has before it. [Applause.] But, my friends, whether this honor falls to me or upon some one more worthy to bear the standard, our appeal, if we hope for success, must be to the awakened conscience of the American people.

A VOICE. Amen.

Mr. BRYAN. We must go forth with an honest platform. We must go forth with an honest organization. We must go forth to make an honest fight; and we must appeal to the conscience of the country, and that conscience to which we must appeal is the most potent force known among men. Tell me that men are kept honest by law! For one man made honest by law an hundred are made honest by conscience. For one man kept in the path of rectitude by fear of prison walls a thousand are kept in the "straight and narrow way" by those invisible walls that conscience rears about him, walls stronger than walls of granite or of stone, and I believe that our appeal will not be in vain.

It is not to be a money campaign. We can not promise any man an advantage over any other man. We can not ask anybody to loan us money in order that we may repay it out of the pockets of the people. Our fight must be made with volunteers, men who are interested in the cause, and I say to you that if I were a candidate I would rather go out and make this fight without a national committee, without a campaign fund, than to go out with a campaign fund the source of which we were not willing to divulge unto all the people of the country. [Great applause.]

And I believe that with a party standing for something, something that the people need; with a party manned by those in whom the people have confidence, and appealing to the conscience of this nation, we can not only hope for a victory, but for a victory that will carry this Government back to its old foundations and make it again what the fathers wanted it to be—"a government of the people, by the people and for the people." [Loud and continued applause.]

Mr. LEAKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent of the committee for five minutes in which to answer my colleague [Mr. HAMILL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEAKE] asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAKE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey, my colleague, misunderstood my reference to Mr. Bryan. I cast no reflection on his character or integrity. He refers to the decalogue. Well, this business of President-making is a serious business. A man in the White House who is radical, flighty, and unsteady can do as much harm as one who is dishonest.

The Democratic party is the great conservative constitutional party of this country. Whenever it departs from its fundamental principles it meets with certain defeat. The American people have a good judgment and usually decide rightly, so that it behooves us more than ever not to depart from our historic doctrines.

I am opposed to the efforts of some leaders in public life to discredit our constitutional form of government, under which we have been so successful these one hundred years, and set up in its stead a government of personal individuality. These leaders propose to change the personnel of the Supreme Court when that bulwark of our liberties disagrees with them.

There are evils in our country which need correction. In correcting them let us not punish multitudes of innocent men to get at a few offenders. The American business man is not dishonest; the American banker is not an embezzler. Let us punish the guilty, but give, in the language of Jefferson, "equal justice to all."

Democracy stands for that. It is against special privileges. It is conservative. Its principles are needed now more than ever before in the history of our country. Mr. Bryan can not represent those principles. His rise has been rapid because of his radicalism. He must now pay the penalty for it. He is associated with free silver, Government ownership of railroads, initiative and referendum, and Government guaranties. All of them are un-Democratic and un-American. With him as our candidate we can not get away from his policies nor can we make paramount the great fundamental doctrines of the Democratic party. We are a party of principle, while you are a party of expediency. We are opposed to special privilege. The Republican party says that it is in favor of tariff revision. Your Speaker is opposed to it and the gentleman from New York is in favor of it. Well, my experience leads me to believe that the Speaker will have his way.

We support the doctrine of Jefferson—that the States are the best administrators of their domestic affairs. I do not like the term "State rights." It is not broad enough. It should be "Home rule." Home rule in municipalities, without interference from the State legislatures. Home rule for the States, without interference from the National Government, except in those cases confided to that Government by the Federal Constitution. I wish we might have a platform with nothing more in it than the sentence of Jefferson: "Equal justice to all men," and a candidate who will reflect that motto. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not surrender the floor; I simply yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, before this bill is reported to the House I should like to make a statement in reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] on the question of the Indian warehouse at St. Louis.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield for that purpose. We have passed that provision in the bill, and the St. Louis warehouse is provided for in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York demands the floor, and is recognized.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall take advantage here also, in speaking to the pro forma amendment, simply to say that it is very pleasing to us over here to see our brothers across the aisle live in such delightful unity.

I want to say, further, Mr. Chairman, just a word to express my appreciative acknowledgment of the courteous treatment the House has given through many days to the Indian appropriation bill, which, as we all know, contains many items of really very little interest to the great body of Members of the House. I want especially here and now to express my acknowledgments to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who I expect, in anticipation of this bouquet, has left the Chamber, for the painstaking care that he has evidenced in the examination of this bill—evidenced by his remarks upon various provisions of it and his criticisms of it. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that it seems to me wholesome and worthy of commendation that an intelligent, capable, and industrious Member, not a member of the committee having in charge any particular bill, should devote his time to it as the gentleman from Illinois has done to this bill. It can only produce good results. I want to say, further, that I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the gentleman from Illinois has demonstrated that his opposition has at no time been captious, because whenever he has had an opportunity to have a provision stricken out under the rules, when it was demonstrated that the provision was reasonable and fair, he has always withdrawn the point of order.

Having said this much, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted, in engrossing the bill, to make the correction of the totals which have been made necessary by amendments adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Pending the submission of the request, if the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a moment, I would ask unanimous consent for about four minutes of the time of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, I shall make my motion before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want the time while we are in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw that request and allow the gentleman from Mississippi to make his request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to address the House five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the risibilities of the Members on the other side of the Chamber seem to have been aroused a few moments ago about a clash of opinion upon this side. They seem especially to rejoice in the fact that there is no rod of authority in the Democratic party whereby absolute unanimity of expression about measures or candidates can be obtained. While I of course regret that all Democrats do not always express exactly the same ideas under the same circumstances, I thought, perhaps, it would be well to emphasize before the country just at this moment the reason why the Republicans here are generally united—outwardly, at any rate—notwithstanding the fact that now and then one of them arises in his place and serves notice that if somebody does not "get out of the way he is going to be run over." I can not express that idea any better than by reading a little piece of poetry that was produced in the Chicago Record-Herald, and of which, emphatically, I am not the author. I do not wish to be charged with all the doggerel I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is entitled "Uncle Joe's Psalm of Life."

And it reads as follows:

Tell me not, oh, fellow Members,
That we ought to put on steam;
Let the flame die down to embers
While we sit around and dream.

Say revision to your sorrow!
Let us fritter time away,
Acting so that each to-morrow
Finds us where we are to-day.

[Laughter.]

Talk is cheap, and time is fleetin',
Let the foolish public rave;
It's enough that we keep meetin'
And most gener'ly behave.

Though our critics would remind us
How to make our lives sublime,
Let us act so they may find us
Doin' nothin' all the time.

[Laughter.]

While the highest aim is to produce unanimity in "doin' nothin' all the time," the method of procuring that unanimity is asserted in the last verse of the "Psalm," which has, I am sure, received the approval of the Speaker, and, for all I know, was written by him. [Laughter.] Listen to this last verse. I have no rod of authority, but "Uncle Joe" may have one. At any rate the author of these lines, which, if not poetry, might be "werse," thinks so, for he says:

If by chance a foolish brother
Should rebel or make a kick,
Trust your "Uncle Joe" to smother
His ambition mighty quick.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LEAKE. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the committee for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, during my temporary absence in the committee room, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made some statements which I can not let go unchallenged. He said with respect to the Indian warehouse established in St. Louis some years ago that it was unnecessary; that it was simply established as a sort of favor to the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Hitchcock, who is a Missourian. I am in receipt of a telegram from the Business Men's League of St. Loius, which I should like to insert in the RECORD, to the effect that the Indian warehouse at St. Louis has done more business than the Indian warehouse at New York City during the years 1905, 1906, and 1907.

The telegram is as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., February 11, 1908.

Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Republic prints Washington telegram to-day, saying FITZGERALD of New York making an attack on St. Louis Indian warehouse; merchants telephoning asking me to wire you, St. Louis warehouse Indian Bureau records will show has done more business 1905, 1906, and 1907 than New York warehouse; $74,000 worth of shoes sold by St. Louis merchants to Indians last year through warehouse. Hitchcock interview defends warehouse on score economy to Government.

WM. F. SAUNDERS,
Manager Business Men's League.

The reason for the large business done by the St. Louis Indian warehouse is that St. Louis leads in certain branches of trade—for instance, tobacco, drugs, shoes, and some other things—and because of the fact that our warehouse is located closer to the Indian reservations than other warehouses, the Government finds it more profitable to make its purchases there than elsewhere. This warehouse has not only not been unnecessary, but it has proved to be very profitable to the Government. Only about eight or nine thousand dollars are being annually spent for its maintenance, while the saving through its establishment amounts to more than $20,000 a year. And as to the former Secretary of the Interior having anything to do with its establishment, let me say that this is a mistaken notion, because that supply depot was established through the efforts of the Representatives in Congress from the city of St. Louis and in response to the needs of the service.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to ask unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no misunderstanding of my position about the St. Louis Indian warehouse, I will state it again. I do not recall that I stated that it had been established because of the influence of the Secretary of the Interior, but I repeat that my belief is that it was retained, not because it was necessary to the Indian Service, but because of the interest of the then Secretary of the Interior in having it retained. I have not examined the figures showing the amount of business done in the various warehouses in the last two or three years, but I remember when the investigation was made it was shown that with the warehouse at Omaha and the warehouse at Chicago there was practically no need for the warehouse at St. Louis. I have no particular interest in establishing or maintaining a warehouse in the city of New York. If it be unnecessary for the Indian Service, it should be abolished; but I repeat what I said the other day when the matter was before the House, that I had hoped that, the chief cause for retaining the warehouse at St. Louis having been separated from the Service, it would be well to send that warehouse after the reason for its existence.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wish to add to what the gentleman from New York has said, that it is a mistake to say that the New York warehouse has not done more business in any year than the St. Louis warehouse. It is simply a question of bookkeeping in getting the amount of goods that were sent out from St. Louis. The bids have not been opened at St. Louis, but the main places for opening bids have been at New York and Chicago, and those are the two warehouses where the greater part of the business has been conducted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think those who are familiar with the facts know that the bids for the greater part of the supplies have been received at the two great commercial centers of the country—New York and Chicago—and that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] is correct.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 40, at the end of line 6, to insert an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to return to page 40, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. May we have the amendment read, pending the right to object?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment may be reported for the information of the committee. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 6, page 40, by inserting at the end of the line the following:

"That the provisions of that portion of section 9 of the act of April 26, 1906, conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, consider, and adjudicate certain claims against the Mississippi Choctaw Indians be, and hereby are, extended with like force and effect to the claims of Chester Howe, his associates and assigns, for like services rendered the said Indians and moneys expended for their benefit, and the court may consolidate actions brought hereunder with any similar action or actions now pending, and any judgment so rendered shall be paid as provided in said act hereinbefore referred to."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to object to the request of my colleague, but I shall be obliged to raise the point of order against the amendment, which surely would be sustained. If the gentleman desires to discuss the subject, I will consent, but I shall be obliged to insist on the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I just wish a moment to explain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, section 9 of the act approved April 26, 1906, in part, reads as follows:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear, consider, and adjudicate the claims against the Mississippi Choctaws of the estate of Charles F. Winton, deceased, his associates and assigns, for services rendered and expenses incurred in the matter of the claims of the Mississippi Choctaws to citizenship in the Choctaw Nation, and to render judgment thereon on the principle of quantum meruit, in such amount or amounts as may appear equitable or justly due therefor, which judgment, if any, shall be paid from any funds now or hereafter due such Choctaws by the United States. Notice of such suit shall be served on the governor of the Choctaw Nation, and the Attorney-General shall appear and defend the said suit on behalf of said Choctaws.

Mr. Chairman, when the Choctaw people moved west from Mississippi, they left several thousand of their people who were entitled to lands in Mississippi if they did not emigrate.

These people were deprived of their Mississippi lands, but still remained in the State, and later the Choctaw Nation recovered judgment for the very lands they were deprived of, and it constitutes a large portion of their trust funds. (Choctaw Nation v. United States, 119 Rep., p. 1.)

When the nation decided to divide its lands in the Indian Territory, no provision was made for these people. They were full-blood Choctaws, ignorant, poor, destitute, living in different parts of Mississippi, with no agent and apparently no protector.

Largely owing to the efforts of Mr. Howe, who went to Mississippi and ascertained their condition, the committee made a provision, first for identification, then for enrollment, but obliged them to move to the Indian Territory within six months in order to secure their rights.

They had no money, no clothing. Mr. Howe secured funds to buy clothing, food, transportation, had them identified, then enrolled. In doing this, he pledged his individual credit, as well as interested his friends, and each one of these parties secured an estate worth at least $5,000, probably $7,000.

After getting them ready, it was discovered that the Mississippi law prohibited the moving of a laborer out of the State without the payment of his debts, making it a misdemeanor, and these Indians then came within the law. As a result, the debts had to be paid, for they had to move within the time or lose their rights.

The Government appropriated $20,000 and moved 261 persons, or 50 families, but took those who were ready to go; the better class. The other 800 had to get across themselves or be assisted. This assistance was furnished.

When the Indians arrived in the Choctaw Nation, the good lands were all occupied. They had no houses, no place to go, nothing to eat. Homes had to be furnished and opportunities for labor secured until crops could be made and the right of possession of lands, in some instances, purchased. These valuable lands are now theirs. All that is sought is a return of the money and reasonable payment for the service upon the principle of quantum meruit. One suit involving this matter is now before the Court of Claims, authorized by act of Congress, and the purpose of this amendment is only to allow an intervention to the end that the whole matter may be decided at one time.

The adjudication of this is an act of justice. No fraud is possible. No titles are brought in question, and nothing which retards the development of Indian Territory. Under existing laws, the dishonest can avoid return of this money, while accepting its benefits, which all acknowledge. The Choctaw Nation is not interested, as it does not apply to their national funds in any way. It is a simple payment, without interest, of moneys honestly advanced, in the interest of the people and for beneficial services rendered to them.

All of these reasons caused the original legislation, and apply with equal force to the amendment offered, which tends to a correct showing of the actual and complete transactions.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is familiar with the matter, and I will yield the balance of my time to him.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, other parties have been granted the right to sue for such items as are included in this matter, and eventually this man will possibly be given the right to bring this suit, and it seems to me that it would be better to have all the suits brought at one time in order that the matter may be decided at once and in one suit. As to the justice of Mr. Howe's claim, I am not so familiar with it. He has a right to have his day in court and a determination as to whether his cause is a just one.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has he a contract approved?

Mr. CARTER. I do not think he has.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law his contract must have been approved by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we go back to page 39 in order to insert an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the amendment be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send the amendment to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BYRD. I think I shall have to read it myself. It is as follows:

Insert between lines 12 and 13, page 39, the following paragraph: "For the support and education of the Choctaws in Mississippi, $50,000, the same to be paid per capita to said Indians after their enumeration by the Interior Department."

Mr. SHERMAN. I object, Mr. Chairman, to going back. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended be passed.

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent to be heard for three minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may extend his remarks.

Mr. BYRD. But I have made no remarks to extend.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may incorporate in the RECORD the thoughts he has in his mind which he was going to voice. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15219, the Indian appropriation bill, and had agreed to certain amendments and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there any demand for a separate vote on any amendment? If not, the amendments will be considered in gross.

The amendments were considered and agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent sent that in engrossing the bill the Clerk make the corrections in the totals made necessary by the adoption of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16872), introduced by me to make Lincoln's birthday a public holiday, and to consider the same in the House at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, let the bill be read.

Mr. PAYNE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SULZER. In my opinion Lincoln's birthday should be a legal holiday, and I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move you, sir, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16882), making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], the senior minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, as to what disposition of time he desires.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I think that our side of the House prefers that general debate should be unlimited at this time, and I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will consent that general debate shall run until further orders.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is acceptable. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be divided equally between the two sides, I to have charge of the time on this side, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to have charge of the time on the other.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate should be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and one-half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is the intention to proceed with the reading of this bill under the five-minute rule to-day in any event?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; not to-day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall take five minutes in what I desire to say. At some hearings the other day in the Ways and Means Committee room, in the presence of the Speaker of this House and myself, I made some remarks which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] thought were unjust to him. I certainly desire to do no injustice to Senator BEVERIDGE or to anyone else. I spoke what I thought was the fact, and the whole thing I think is well stated in a letter which I have just received from Senator BEVERIDGE. If I had received the information contained in his letter before I made the statement, I certainly would not have made it. He says:

> In the hearings of your remarks before the delegation of manufacturers and producing interests just laid before me you say, referring to my bill—

I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that I referred both to his bill and to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER], a Member of this House, which bills were identical on the subject of a tariff commission. I continue to read from Senator BEVERIDGE'S letter:

> In the hearings of your remarks before the delegation of manufacturers and producing interests, just laid before me, you say, referring to my bill, "Probably you know something about their origin and where they were drawn." I take it that you would not knowingly make a statement from which a false impression could be drawn; and I think it only proper that before you made that statement, you should have asked me personally. Since you did not, I have to inform you that the bill was drawn in my office by myself; was dictated to my stenographer, Mr. Goetz; was afterwards revised and redrafted by myself in my study at my home, again being dictated to the same gentleman; that I am the author of the bill in every word, line, punctuation mark.
> Since your remarks indicate that the bill was drawn somewhere else by some one else, and that it had its origin in some other mind, I trust that you will correct your statement in as conspicuous a way as you originally made it.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BYRD].

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, permit me to explain briefly the amendment to the Indian appropriation bill offered by me a few moments ago, and which, on account of a point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], I could not then explain.

I seek by this amendment to secure an appropriation of $50,000 annually for the support and education of the few remaining Choctaws in the State of Mississippi, numbering at this time about 350. No one acquainted with their present condition, or with the policy of the Government in dealing with these unfortunate people, would for a moment question the justice of this proposition.

Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with these remarks, I would like to advise the House of a few things to the credit of this fast dying race. A few centuries ago their warriors might have been numbered by thousands, roaming over the great southwestern valley, boasting that their domain reached from the rising to the setting sun, while now their few remaining descendants are straggling vagabonds, having nowhere to lay their heads; and unless something is done by the Government to rescue them from the clutches of disease and poverty before "many moons" the last of the race will fall to sleep in the arms of the Great Spirit, whose still sweet voice whispered peace to their wigwams ere the orthodox cross of greed was planted upon their native shore. They grew to be a mighty race, prospering and increasing until the paleface serpents began to creep into their Eden. Upon these credulous people the white man perpetrated one act of fraud after another until finally they were forced to surrender their magnificent estate, inherited from their ancestors, for a promise of a paltry inheritance beyond the Mississippi. They were once rich, but now poor; once happy, now distressed. Once the eloquence of their orators mingled with the music of the rippling waters; now the coming shadows of racial death have silenced their ringing war whoop into the silent murmurings known only to the hopeless and helpless.

The roar of the locomotive has forever supplanted the screams of the wild panther, and the rattling plowshare has frightened the bounding deer from the forest. Smiling fields of husbandry now mark the Meccas of the red man, where he once romped and danced and wooed and died; where his dusky children gamboled with the wild flowers and the clinging vines, and where his dead are silently awaiting a resurrection into the happy hunting grounds beyond the grave. All that he loved and cherished have passed and gone. He moves, acts, and suffers like the shorn lamb before the untempered winds. [Applause.]

The loyalty of the Choctaw to the white man has been as unchangeable as the magnet. His gratitude has only been exceeded by our ingratitude. In war, in pestilence, and in peace he has been our foremost friend, and yet when he now comes, like Lazarus to the gate of Dives, begging for bread, we hand him a serpent.

Notwithstanding he has been more thoroughly robbed and more cruelly treated by the white man than any other tribe of the American Indian, yet he has always been his friend. Claiborne, the historian, says:

> The Choctaw orator always proudly boasted that their nation had never shed the blood of a white man.

As early as 1720 we find as many as 700 Choctaw warriors, under the leadership of their great mingo, or chief, marching to the rescue of the French settlers along the lower Mississippi Valley, who were being butchered by the bloodthirsty Natchez, the sun worshipers. A century after this, when the English and Spanish, by the aid of the great Shawnee chief, Tecumseh, had incited the Creeks to go to war with the white settlers of Alabama, they, instead of taking sides with their racial neighbors, enlisted under the Stars and Stripes and fought side by side with Jackson and Claiborne until the end of that bloody war, and their bones are to-day bleaching with those of our own soldier dead at Horseshoe Bend, Fort Mims, and other battlefields along the Alabama and the Coosa. When the news spread over the Southwest that the British had landed a hostile force at New Orleans they flocked by hundreds to assist General Jackson in expelling the foreign foe, and in the great battle that followed none fought more bravely than the Choctaw warriors.

In 1811, when Tecumseh went upon his daring mission to the South to organize a great war confederacy against the white settlers, he met the chiefs of the Choctaws and pleaded with them for many days and with much eloquence to join him. It is said by the historian that many of the young men were deeply agitated by the matchless eloquence of this northern warrior, but all of his influence was destroyed, and he was sent away in despair by the eloquent reply made to his speech by the Choctaw chief, Pushmattaha, who, in part, said:

> You are now on your way, Tecumseh, to visit the Muskogees and to court an alliance with them. In three days you will enter their villages and eat out of their bowls. They abhor the white man and will listen to your talk, and when they hear your war whoop they will be ready to strike. But the Choctaws and Muskogees can never travel on the warpath together. Our old men and our traditions forbid it. The ghosts of our fathers would meet us and drive us back to our hunting grounds. The bones of our warriors, slain by Muskogees, are moldering near by, unavenged, and last night I heard their complaints around my camp. Even now I hear the voices of the dead in the passing breeze and I see their spirits in yonder cloud. They hold the pipe of peace to the white man and the tomahawk to the Muskogee.

This renowned chief was a great admirer of General Jackson, recognizing in his rugged honesty and intrepid bravery virtues he believed the Great Spirit imparted to but few save the Choctaw warriors. After having followed Jackson through all of the bloody wars of the Southwest, and after the latter became President, he visited this capital in order that he might once more behold his great white friend, and also to meet General Lafayette, whom he greatly admired and who was then on his last visit to America. While here he became suddenly ill and in a few days died. Being visited on his deathbed by General Jackson, he was asked if he had any request to make, and the dying warrior said: "When I am dead fire the big guns over me." These were his last words, which to-day may be read upon the faded marble slab in the Congressional Cemetery, hard by this Capitol. The historian, in recording this visit, says:

> In 1824, with a delegation of his people, he visited Washington. Lafayette was then the guest of the Republic. The Choctaws waited upon him, and Pushmattaha delivered an address rarely surpassed in pathos and grandeur. The venerable Frenchman and all who heard it were deeply impressed.
> This was his last speech. The voice of his Father was then calling him to the spirit land. His parting words to Lafayette were: "We heard of you in our distant villages. We longed to see you. We have come. We have taken you by the hand. For the last time we look on the face of the great warrior whose fathers were the friends of our fathers. We go. 'Tis the last time we shall meet. We shall both soon be in the land of shadows."

Of course, Mr. Chairman, this is all foreign to the question raised by my amendment. I refer to it only for the purpose of impressing this House with the kindly feelings with which the Choctaw always regarded the white man, and in order that we may more keenly appreciate the baseness of our ingratitude in permitting the remaining few of these unfortunate people to suffer in this land of plenty.

President Jackson, whom these untutored people idolized, in order to induce them to surrender the soil of Mississippi for an estate in the Territory used all the chicanery of statecraft, promising them that if they would surrender their Mississippi homes in exchange for a home in the West that the latter should be theirs "as long as the grass grows and the water flows." Again he said to them through his agents:

> There your Great Father will protect you and there, undisturbed and uninterrupted by the whites, you can enjoy yourselves and be happy * * *. For you we have the best feelings; our complexions are different, but our hearts and our natures are the same; the Great Spirit above is our common father.

Being no longer able to resist the seductive persuasions of the great President, on the 27th of September, 1830, the Choctaws surrendered the lands of their fathers, broad and rich as they were, for this promised home in the West, which was to be theirs and their descendants in fee simple. Here permit me to insert in the RECORD the deed made by President Jackson, conveying to them their Territorial estates in pursuance of the said treaty:

> Whereas on the 27th day of September last a treaty was concluded at Dancing Rabbit Creek between Commissioners duly appointed on the part of the United States and the Choctaw Nation of Indians; and the same, having been ratified by the Senate, was officially promulgated on the 24th of February, 1831, which treaty, in the second article, stipulates "that the United States, under a grant specially to be made by the President, shall cause to be conveyed to the Choctaw Nation a tract of country west of the Mississippi River, in fee simple to them and their descendants, to inure to them while they shall exist as a nation and live on it, beginning near Fort Smith, where the Arkansas boundary crosses the Arkansas River, running thence to the source of the Canadian fork, if in the limits of the United States, or to those limits; thence due south to Red River and down Red River to the west boundary of the Territory of Arkansas; thence north along that line to the beginning."
> Now, in pursuance of said treaty, and of the powers and authority vested in me by an act of Congress approved the 28th day of May, 1830, entitled "An act to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories and for their removal west of the Mississippi River," said country as is described in the second article of said treaty is hereby granted and assigned to said Choctaw Nation of Indians to the extent and after the condition of tenure therein declared, and liable to no transfer or alienation except to the United States.
> In testimony hereof, and that the same may be carried into effect, I have signed this grant with my own hand, and cause it to be certified under the seal of the War Department, this 26th day of May, 1831, and of the State Department.
> ANDREW JACKSON.
> By the President:
> E. LIVINGSTON, Secretary of State.
> By the President of the United States:
> JOHN H. EATON, Secretary of War.

For a complete and perfect statement of all the transactions between the Government and the Choctaws, I refer the House to a very extended and able brief inserted in the RECORD of February 11 by my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

After this transaction the Government transported thousands of these Choctaws to their new home in the West. Many remained and still remain; many died from the rigor of the hard climate, and many, after the loss of their relatives, returned to their native haunts in Mississippi, where three or four hundred of their descendants now remain in a most deplorable and destitute condition.

Just here it must be remembered that under another article of the treaty referred to those who so desired were permitted to remain, and it was expressly stipulated that by so doing they did not forfeit their rights as tenants in common in the Territorial domain, but the only thing they would forfeit would be the right to share in the annuity of $20,000 promised by the Government to be paid annually for twenty years. Hence it must be seen that the Mississippi Choctaw still owns an undivided interest in the Choctaw division of the Territory.

This treaty could never have been consummated except for the fourteenth article thereof, which provided that any Choctaw desiring to remain in Mississippi should have allotted to him by officers of the General Government a section of land including the land upon which his home was situated; but the avowed purpose of the Government being to remove him west of the Mississippi undertook to abrogate this provision, and by all kinds of subterfuges rendered it almost impossible for him to receive his allotment. Mr. Claiborne, in his "History of Mississippi," on this point says:

> The operation of the fourteenth article (which had accomplished the treaty) was deceptive and destructive. Many who had left the ground were ignorant of their rights and were not informed in time to make the required application to the agent. Many who knew the provisions of the fourteenth article would not apply because they distrusted the white man, nor could they comprehend that there was any power on earth who had the power to dispossess them of the land whereon they were born and which they occupied and cultivated. The agent resided at a long distance from many of them, and the old and infirm could not present themselves. Many who went found the agent intoxicated, in an ill humor, were long delayed waiting for him to become sober, and finally he peremptorily refused to register them, and they returned, starving, penniless, despairing, to find their country swarming with speculators, who readily persuaded them to part with their rights and wander away.

This outrageous method of robbing these defenseless people continued until the Mississippi legislature, on the 25th day of February, 1837, passed resolutions calling upon Governor Lynch to intercede with the Federal Government in their behalf. Thereupon President Tyler sent a commission to further urge them to remove to their home west of the Mississippi. As a member of this commission was the Hon. William Tyler, the brother of the President. They met the chiefs of the Choctaws, and again, by persuasive and deceptive arguments urged those who still remained under the provision of the said fourteenth article of the treaty to immediately consent to removal to the West. To this unreasonable request the Choctaws seriously protested, claiming their rights to remain under the treaty. And here let me insert the eloquent and pathetic speech of their great chief protesting against the infidelity of their great White Father in making this unjust demand:

Brother, we have heard you talk as from the lips of our Father, the great White Chief at Washington, and my people have called on me to speak to you. The red man has no books, and when he wishes to make known his views, like his fathers before him, he speaks it from his mouth. He is afraid of writing. When he speaks, he knows what he says; the Great Spirit hears him. Writing is the invention of the palefaces; it gives birth to error and to fraud. The Great Spirit talks; we hear him in the thunder, in the rushing winds and the mighty waters, but he never writes.

Brother, when you were young we were strong; we fought by your side; but our arms are now broken. You have grown large. My people have become small.

Brother, my voice is weak; you can scarcely hear me; it is not the shout of the warrior, but the wail of the infant. I have lost it in mourning over the misfortunes of my people. These are their graves, and in those aged pines you hear the ghosts of the departed. Their ashes are here, and we have been left to protect them. Our warriors are nearly all gone to the far country west, but here are our dead. Shall we go too and give their bones to the wolves?

Brother, two sleeps have passed since we heard you talk. We have thought upon it. You ask us to leave our country and tell us it is our Father's wish. We would not desire to displease our Father. We respect him and you, his child; but the Choctaw always thinks. We want time to answer.

Brother, our hearts are full. Twelve winters ago our chiefs sold our country. Every warrior that you see here was opposed to the treaty. If the dead could have been counted it would never have been made; but, alas, though they stood around, they could not be seen nor heard. Their tears came in the raindrops and their voices in the wailing wind, but the palefaces knew it not, and our land was taken away.

Brother, we do not now complain. The Choctaw suffers; but he never weeps. You have the strong arm, and we can not resist; but the paleface worships the Great Spirit. So does the red man. The Great Spirit loves truth. When you took our country you promised us land. There is your promise in the book. Twelve times have the trees dropped their leaves, and yet we have received no land. Our houses have been taken from us. The white man's plow turns up the bones of our fathers. We dare not kindle our fires, and yet you said that we might remain and you would give us land.

Brother, is this truth? But we believe now that our Great Father knows our condition. He will listen to us. We are as mourning orphans in our country, but our Father will take us by the hand. When he fulfills his promise, we will answer his call. He means well. We know it, but we can not think now. Grief has made children of us. When our business is settled, we shall be men again and talk to our Great Father about what he has proposed.

Brother, you stand in the moccasins of a great chief. You speak the word of a mighty nation, and your talk was long. My people are small. Their shadow scarcely reaches your knee. They are scattered and gone. When I shout, I hear my voice in the depth of the wood, but no answering shout comes back. My words therefore are few. I have nothing more to say but to tell what I have said to the tall chief of the palefaces, whose brother stands by your side.

This proceeding is but an index to the infidelity of the Government in dealing with the Choctaw. The first act was to rob them of their heritage in Mississippi and the last to bar them from the Territory.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. BYRD. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Are not the Choctaw now entitled to a great deal of land in the Indian Territory?

Mr. BYRD. Yes; but how can they get it? It belongs to their tribe, but they have been outlawed by a ruling of the Department or act of Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why should not Congress see that these Indians get their rights now?

Mr. BYRD. That is what I say, too. Why does not the gentleman see to it; he is on the committee?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have numerous bills pending and have been fighting for years along the line of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. BYRD. The Department says they have lost their rights to take up lands in the Territory.

Not 5 per cent of those entitled under the treaty to take allotments in Mississippi were ever permitted to do so. To prevent them, trickery, deception, and even force were resorted to. In proof of this, consult the history of the transaction.

The next scene in the drama of the Choctaw robbery was a few years ago, when the Government undertook to divide in severalty their common estate in the Territory. As soon as the Curtis bill passed the land thieves, from Portland to Brownsville, swooped down like so many vultures upon these defenseless people, and the manner in which they have been looted and robbed makes the darkest page of our legislative and administrative history.

This whole scheme was launched for the avowed purpose of outlawing the Mississippi Choctaw. The first edict issued was that none but those residing in the Territory at that time could share in the distribution of the lands, but this was abandoned. Then it was contended that only those who could trace their ancestry back to a certain class who participated in the treaty could receive a share, and this too was abandoned; and next it was insisted that only the descendants of the full bloods could inherit, and this likewise was overruled.

Being forced to admit that the Choctaw territory belonged to the tribe in common, regardless of where they lived or who their ancestors were, or whether half blood or whole blood, it was decided that the only way to outlaw the Mississippi Choctaws was to railroad a law through Congress requiring them to immediately remove to the Territory and live upon their several allotments, and that unless this was done within six months they were forever barred. Under this unlawful, unjust, and cruel law they have lost all. The book of fate seems to be forever closed against them. It was the "unkindest cut of all."

Why, Mr. Chairman, this procedure was nothing less than legalized robbery. Upon what process of reasoning can we justify either the justice or the legality of such action? Can the Government after executing a fee-simple title to this estate afterwards destroy the title by entailing an impossible condition upon it? Certainly not. There is not a lawyer who ever read three pages of Blackstone who will disagree with me on this proposition. But, whether the law be or be not constitutional, the Mississippi Choctaws are bound by it just the same, for the reason that the Government is cloistered behind that relic of kingcraft, that the sovereign can do no wrong, nor be sued, except by consent. Bills are pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs providing that these poor people be given access to the courts to ascertain their rights, but not one of them will be reported, for to do so would mean the defeat of the well-planned scheme of robbery.

Then, too, how unreasonable was the proposition to require these poor people to remove to the Territory within the short period of six months. They were without means, ignorant, and helpless. But it is contended that the Government made an appropriation of $20,000 to move them. This might have sufficed to take some of them, but the whole amount was expended, and yet over 350 remained in Mississippi.

But admitting that they could have provided means for transportation, how were they to live on the blizzard-swept prairie, without houses, without food, clothing, or the implements of husbandry? Why, sir, a decree requiring the public school children of this city to go and provide homes for themselves on the frozen plains of Manitoba would not have been more cruel and unreasonable. Many of those who did go died from exposure. In many instances they were crowded during a long, cold winter into cotton sheds, barns, and warehouses. Disease broke out among them, and in some instances whole families perished.

Let it never be forgotten that this Government, since 1831, has been the self-constituted guardian of the Choctaws. Without invitation, we assumed the right to administer this sacred trust. Have we kept faith with our wards? Let their destitution and the deeds of robbery perpetrated upon them answer. Were we discharging our duty with all fidelity to them when we leased their valuable oil and coal lands to corporations for a mere trifle, or when we paid one law firm a little less than one million dollars out of their common fund in order to assist us in robbing them? Three hundred and fifty shares of that great sum was the lawful property of the Mississippi Choctaws and should have gone to them instead of to attorneys especially employed to defraud them. I don't say that these lawyers did not earn their fee. They won the case. With the aid of a few Government officials they succeeded in robbing my Choctaw friends of an interest in an empire. I dare say that no Roman general ever more thoroughly looted or pillaged a conquered nation than did these officers and attorneys these unfortunate people.

But I understand that there are yet 3,000,000 acres of this common estate and about $400,000 unappropriated and unstolen. Now, in the name of reason and common justice, why not repeal this cruel statute, and let these Mississippi Choctaws yet share in this common estate? If you are not willing to do this, then open the doors of the courts and let them sue for their property, and if you are blinded to this just demand, let me implore you to provide for their support by a direct appropriation from the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, as a parting request for these ill-fated people, let me importune this House to never again require them to move to the West. They prefer to starve about the graves of their ancestors rather than face the horrors incident to poverty in a strange, friendless land. If you ever permit them to reclaim their interests in the Territory, then, as their guardians, dispose of it and apply the proceeds to their support, and, above all things, shield them from that army of sharks who are ever ready to intercept every morsel offered them by the Government. [Applause.]

An infinitesimal part of the $600,000,000 spent on the savage negroes of the Philippines, if given to the Mississippi Choctaws, would have been like manna from heaven to them. Do not conclude, should you desire to provide for them, that they would become a burden to the Government. They are gradually passing away, falling like autumn leaves, the victims of dreadful diseases, produced by exposure and poverty, and before many decades shall have passed the last of this once happy race will fall to sleep in the arms of the Great Spirit, whose bidding voice he now hears in the sighing winds and rippling waters.

> The wild deer and wolf to a covert can flee,
> But I have no refuge from famine and danger;
> A home and a country remain not to me.
> Never again in the green, sunny bowers
> Where my forefathers lived shall I spend the sweet hours.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, in presenting my remarks in connection with the bill now under discussion I desire to submit to the Committee of the Whole House that the subcommittee in the hearings, as well as the general committee in charge of the bill, were very greatly impressed and influenced by the statements of the chairman of the general committee [Mr. TAWNEY] in opening his remarks upon the urgent deficiency bill in this language:

> I feel that it is my duty in presenting this first appropriation bill of the session, to call attention to the necessity for a practical revision of the estimated ordinary expenses of the Government for which appropriations are asked for the next fiscal year, to the end that these authorized expenditures may be kept within the estimated revenues for that year.

In connection with these remarks he quoted from the Secretary of the Treasury to this effect:

> The last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury gives us his estimates of the revenues for the next fiscal year. * * * It is only fair to say that this estimate was made before the recent financial depression, and in submitting the estimates in his annual report the Secretary says, "It is estimated that upon the basis of existing laws the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year 1909 will be $878,123,030."

The Secretary also says:

> The above estimates are submitted in pursuance of law. I regret the necessity of submitting them, for they are for the most part problematical.

But Chairman TAWNEY, in closing his detailed statement, adds this:

> Total estimated appropriations, $912,949,288.96, showing an excess of the estimate of appropriations submitted by the several Departments over the estimated revenues of the Government for the fiscal year 1909 of $34,826,277.66.

The chairman [Mr. TAWNEY], in closing his remarks, emphasized his opening statement, as follows:

> All new authorizations only emphasize what I said at the beginning, that it is absolutely necessary for us to practically revise the estimates in making up the several appropriation bills if we are to avoid facing a certain deficiency at the end of the first session of this Congress.

I desire simply to emphasize what he has said and to say, in going through this appropriation bill, which directly maintains more largely than any other the great subordinate force of the Government, that we have been constrained wherever it has been possible, without in any wise, as we think, affecting a fair conduct of each of the Departments of the Government, in cutting down the estimates submitted in the Book of Estimates. The Members of the House will have full access to our report, which covers every detail of change in the bill, which we will have under the five-minute rule and intelligently understand. I will read from the report:

> The estimates on which the bill is based will be found on pages 9–115 and 156–170 of the Book of Estimates for 1909, and aggregate $34,210,716.13, of which amount there is recommended in the bill $32,336,573, a reduction of $1,874,143.13 under said estimates.
> The appropriations for the same purposes for the current fiscal year, including $370,950 in the sundry civil and deficiency acts of the last session, aggregated $32,406,493.80, being $69,920.80 more than is recommended in the accompanying bill for the service of the fiscal year 1909.
> The whole number of salaries specifically provided for in this bill is 14,818, or 341 less than the number estimated for, and 27 more than the number provided for in the law for the current year.

In addition I submit in detail the increases in the salaries asked for, 1,239, amounting to $451,000, an average increase of $367.

Increase of compensation asked for.

	Number.	Amount.
Library of Congress	24	$4,560
Court of Claims	3	360
Executive	8	3,180
Civil Service Commission	11	5,320
Department of State	8	2,900
Treasury Department	123	13,282
Independent Treasury	185	83,210
War Department	61	15,678
Navy Department	129	30,040
Interior Department	611	298,840
Post-Office Department	40	18,870
Commerce and Labor	19	7,190
Department of Justice	14	12,150
Judicial	3	1,200
Total	1,239	451,780

Average increase of $367.

The only salaries distinctively raised in this bill are the First Assistant Secretary of State, who in the absence of the Secretary performs the duties and obligations of the Secretary, from $4,500 to $6,000, an increase of $1,500; the second secretary from $4,500 to $5,000. In the Treasury Department all are increased from $4,500 to $6,000, because they can all be authorized to exercise the authority of the absent Secretary. In the War Department, the one secretary only, from $4,500 to $6,000. In the Navy Department, the one secretary only, from $4,500 to $6,000. The Interior Department, the first secretary from $4,500 to $6,000, and the second secretary from $4,500 to $5,000. In the Post-Office Department, the first secretary, who now receives $5,000 to $6,000, and from $4,500 to $5,000 the three remaining secretaries. The Department of Commerce and Labor, having one, $5,000 to $6,000, aggregating $15,500.

Of the other salaries, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury from $4,500 to $5,500. For 53 first assistant examiners of the Patent Office from $1,800 to $2,000, 63 second assistant examiners from $1,600 to $1,800, 73 third assistant examiners from $1,400 to $1,600, and 83 fourth assistant examiners from $1,200 to $1,400. One Commissioner of Education from $3,500 to $5,000; one superintendent of dead letter division from $2,500 to $3,000; aggregating $57,400.

I do not desire at this time to enter upon the details of the bill, because ample time will be provided later if the debate shall make explanations necessary. I invite the attention of the committee to the fact that in submitting the limitations upon the appropriations we have made, practically only nine, and while it may be they are subject to the point of order your committee have felt that they were necessary for the proper conduct of the Departments in connection with the appropriations that are carried in his bill.

LIMITATIONS.

Limitations with respect to the appropriations made in the bill and not heretofore imposed are recommended as follows:

On page 11:

The salary of each of the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands shall be the same as that of the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico.

On page 63, in connection with the appropriation for expenses of collecting internal revenue:

That no part of this amount be used in defraying the expenses of any officer, designated above, subpœnaed by the United States courts to attend any trial before a United States court or preliminary examination before any United States commissioner, which expenses shall be paid from the appropriation for "Fees of witnesses, United States courts."

On page 95:

The superintendent of the State, War and Navy building shall also act as superintendent of the Navy Department Annex, or Mills Building, and the State Department Annex building.

On page 130 in connection with the appropriations for offices of surveyors-general:

That no expenses chargeable to the foregoing appropriations for clerk hire and incidental expenses, in the offices of the surveyors-general shall be incurred by the respective surveyors-general in the conduct of said offices, except upon previous specific authorization by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

On page 144:

On page 166, it is proposed to reenact Sec. 3, of the last legislative, etc., act, as a limitation on the sums appropriated by the accompanying bill, to read as follows:

SEC. 3. The appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons incapacitated for performing the service for which such person has been employed, and the heads of Departments shall cause this provision to be enforced, either by the demotion or removal of such person from the public service.

On page 166:

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the head of each Executive Department and other Government establishment at Washington to submit to Congress at the beginning of each regular session a statement showing in detail what officers or employees (other than special agents, inspectors, or employees who in the discharge of their regular duties are required to constantly travel) of such Executive Department or other Government establishment have traveled on official business from Washington to points outside of the District of Columbia during the preceding fiscal year, giving in each case the full title of the official or employee, the destination or destinations of such travel, the business or work on account of which the same was made, and the total expense to the United States charged in each case.

On page 167:

SEC. 6. In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, persons employed June 30, 1908, as additional members of the Board of Pension Appeals may be transferred and appointed to places in the classified service of the Department of the Interior without reference to the "Act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States" approved January 16, 1883.

I will reserve the remainder of my time. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, last Monday morning a meeting of the banking and insurance interests of the city of Hartford was held in the board of trade rooms at 11 o'clock in the morning, the busiest hour of the day, on the subject of currency legislation. It is not necessary for me to speak a word of praise of those institutions in the city of Hartford. Its insurance interests are great, because of the great men who conservatively and successfully manage them. Its banking interests are necessarily great also. I want to send to the Clerk's desk and have read in my time a very brief portion of an editorial from the Hartford Courant describing the character of meeting and also the resolutions which the meeting adopted. In doing it I wish to say that these gentlemen were careful to give full and complete notice for a week of the character of the meeting and to send to Washington to the various Representatives from Connecticut to procure all the bills pending before Congress. I ask that the editorial and resolutions be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[The Hartford Courant, Tuesday morning, February 11, 1908.]

THE VOICE OF HARTFORD.

That was an altogether representative gathering of Hartford business men at the board of trade rooms yesterday morning. Leading representatives of almost every bank, trust company, savings bank, life insurance company, and fire insurance company of the city were present. It would be useless to add all their assets together and say how much the meeting represented; but unquestionably it was hundreds of millions of dollars, not belonging to those who were there but in their hands for safe-keeping—intrusted to them by thousands and thousands of people all over the country. Their sole interest is to have the business of the United States conducted on a sound and healthy basis.

All present were of one mind. There were differences of opinion, to be sure, with regard to individual banking bills, but no difference at all on the larger proposition that no bill whatever should pass at the present time. The resolutions, carefully drawn by Vice-President P. H. Woodward, of the Connecticut General Life Insurance Company, speak for themselves. They protest against any enactment at the present time, and call for the appointment of a capable commission to consider the whole subject and report later to Congress:

"Whereas the acute stage of the panic of 1907 is past and the currency then withdrawn from circulation and hoarded is now returning to its accustomed channels; thus for deficiency substituting a redundancy of bankable funds; and

"Whereas steadiness of value in our common measure of value is a factor of prime importance:

"Therefore this body is opposed to the various schemes of inflation now before Congress under the general name of emergency measures, and recommends that if action is deemed necessary at this time it be confined to the creation of a competent commission empowered to investigate the whole subject and report hereafter."

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is all I desire—to present the resolutions—and I yield back the time that has been kindly conceded me by the chairman of the committee.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to make a speech to-day, desiring only to make a statement about the proceedings in the Federal court in New York commonly known as the "tobacco trust case," and to insert some matter pertaining to the history of that case, particularly some pertinent evidence adduced in that case showing its corrupt practices, and I will now ask, Mr. Chairman, that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Gentlemen of the committee, I am doing this because I know that if you will only take the pains to look through the data that I will place in the RECORD that you will wonder that the human mind can become so accomplished in perpetrating fraud and acts of deceit I think it is doubtful if anybody has ever found so many ways to commit frauds and deceive in trade and commerce as the tobacco trust.

It is the most scientific, thorough, and perfect monopoly, the world has ever seen, I think. It is really interesting to study its unique machinery or read of its stealthy, noiseless, and majestic performances, and, I dare say, every lawyer and every citizen of intelligence in the civilized world who is familiar with the action of this combine expresses profoundest astonishment that such a machine was even devised by man. I am unable to give all the facts. We hope to do so later, when they are officially published, but I am able to submit to-day and place in the RECORD some of the landmarks, and you can easily imagine the rest of the proof. This concern belts the world and is pillaging the rights of American citizens, farmers, dealers, manufacturers, and consumers, as well as those in foreign countries. It has fastened its fangs in the liberties of the masses and is successfully stripping them of their substance. It is not only a menace to commerce and trade and dangerous to American institutions, but indeed a professional corruptionist. These and similar concerns must be trimmed down, or sooner or later our people to a man will be in a state of monopolistic paralysis.

Last night I was reading in a New York tobacco journal a statement that the Porto Ricans are crying out against this monster, and I think it has reached its hands down into fair Cuba, and the statement is made that this has been the cause of a great deal of the troubles and the quarrels which have occurred among the Cuban people.

In the course of the hearings on the "free leaf tobacco bill" one witness testified on two different occasions that neither he nor his firm were connected with the tobacco trust; yet only a few weeks ago one of the officers of that concern called, under oath, the name of that party and of the firm that employs him, stating that the firm has been a member of the tobacco trust since 1903—before this witness testified—and it is now said (and I am glad to hear it) that this witness was kept in ignorance of his firm being in the trust. If this is true, think of the firm.

Now, there is another case where a member of a tobacco organization has appeared about Congress, fighting what is known as the "Tawney anticoupon bill." He has stated, so Mr. Campbell, president of this organization, recently said, that his firm was not a member of the tobacco trust. Yet it has developed in this suit that it is a member of that trust. And so the body of the evidence goes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Before the gentleman yields the floor I should like to get from him, if I can do so, some information upon a matter that has come to my attention from a large number of my constituents. It has been charged that the tobacco that is being sold at retail throughout the country is, a large portion of it, adulterated; that there are a great variety of materials that go to make up that tobacco. I should like to know whether that is true?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has anything been undertaken to correct that evil?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I spoke to Doctor Wiley about that some months ago, and he said, as I remember, that he had investigated it, but had not found anything poisonous in the sample examined.

The time of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. CAMPBELL, it was extended five minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know what my friend has in mind, that this tobacco is a mixture, and a very small per cent of it is real tobacco; that it is made up of various ingredients, all of which they will not let the public know; molasses, sugar, pepper, licorice, and other things are mixed up with it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand that certain leaves are used instead of tobacco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, yes; there never has been such an infernal fraud and penetrating curse, as this trust is, perpetrated upon the human family since the devil started sin in this world. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is a broad enough statement. Now, inasmuch as the gentleman is so familiar with the entire subject of tobacco, I am sure he will agree with me that those who use tobacco ought to have good tobacco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Any of it is bad enough, but what is used ought to be good tobacco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; that is true. One of the things that has appealed to me most is that the poor, honest, bright, upright, ambitious young boy, who is trying to get himself up in the world, trying to pull himself up "by his own boot straps," has no chance if he undertakes to go into the tobacco business, or scarcely any other business, because of these immense and overshadowing monopolies that crush him and force him to sell out, worst of all, sell his manhood and independence, to these concerns and learn, from these wolves in sheep's clothing, how to perpetrate frauds upon the American Congress and American people, and that, too—

With smooth dissimulating,
Skilled to grace,
A devil's purpose
With an angel's face.

Mr. Chairman, one of the charges in this great lawsuit is that this trust is a monopoly in restraint of Federal commerce and trade. I will place in the RECORD a statement published in the New York Journal of Commerce of January 30 last going to show this is such a monopoly. It shows that in chewing tobacco that concern controls 80 per cent; smoking tobacco, 75 per cent; snuff, 95 per cent; cigars, 15 per cent; little cigars, 90 per cent; cigarettes, 80 per cent. The American Stogie Company, which is a branch house, made 92,000,000 stogies.

Gen. J. C. McReynolds, counsel for the Government in its suit against the tobacco trust, has brought out the fact at the taking of testimony in the case that the American Tobacco Company and its subsidiaries control the following percentage of the business in the various branches of the trade: Chewing tobacco, 80 per cent; smoking tobacco, 75 per cent; snuff, 95 per cent; cigars, 15 per cent; little cigars, 90 per cent, and cigarettes, 80 per cent. The American Stogie Company, which is a branch of the trust, made 92,000,000 stogies last year. President George H. Hummel is also authority for the statement that the company made a lot of cheap cigars which could not be classed as stogies.

I have some letters in response to mine a few days ago from Edwin P. Grosvenor, one of the associate counsel in this case, asking him to send me some extracts from the testimony, which he could not do, but he wrote:

141 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY, February 4, 1908.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of February 1, asking for excerpts from the evidence which has been taken in proceeding against the American Tobacco Company and others.

The evidence, as you may be aware, has been taken before a special master and has not as yet been formally reported to the court. We have therefore refrained from giving out copies, deeming that the best course to pursue until the evidence shall be formally made a part of the public records.

I hope you will appreciate the situation and recognize the pleasure which it would give me to comply with your request, if conditions were otherwise.

It is undoubtedly true that a number of tobacco manufacturing concerns, including the R. A. Patterson Tobacco Company, of Richmond, Va., the Nall & Williams Tobacco Company, of Louisville, Ky., and the Wells-Whitehead Tobacco Company, of North Carolina, were long secretly owned by the American Tobacco Company, while being advertised, held out to the public and generally represented as independent and free from such connection.

Yours, very truly, EDWIN P. GROSVENOR.

NEW YORK, December 20, 1907.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GAINES: I thank you for the copies of the interesting and valuable report of Hon. E. W. SAUNDERS on the tobacco trade in its relation to taxation and Government monopolies. It is always a pleasure to hear from you and to know that your interest in our case continues.

I am sending you under this cover copies of the United States Tobacco Journal, a trade paper, which will give you some account of the evidence which has been brought out in the course of the trial. During a period of four weeks the Government has been putting in its evidence daily, adjourning yesterday for over the holidays. The evidence involves so much detail that it is not of special interest to the press, and this may account for the lack of fuller reports in the papers.

We have established very convincingly through the letters of the officers of the American Tobacco Company one of the principal charges in our petition, namely, that the American Tobacco Company has secretly operated a large number of corporations, ostensibly independent with the view of crushing out companies which are really independent and unconnected with the "trust."

In fact, the progress of the case has been most encouraging.

Again thanking you for your courtesy in sending these pamphlets, as well as for the valued copies of your speech of June 28, 1906, already acknowledged, I remain,

Yours, very truly, EDWIN P. GROSVENOR.

Mr. Chairman, I think the Post-Office Department should take hold of this trust under its antifraud powers. The evidence clearly shows some of these independent firms belong to the trust, and also discloses that this trust conducts a part of its business by using "straw men" and "straw firms," and of course uses the mail in so doing. In addition to this, these so-called "independents," if not these "straws," advertise their goods thus: "Not made by the trust," or boost their firm by publishing "We are not in the trust," when in fact, these statements are untrue and misleading, to the detriment of trade and commerce and the people, and the mail is used in so doing.

I will add, in conclusion, that in its answer to the bill filed in this case, this monopoly admits practically the allegations, but denies the deductions it contains and claims its business is moral, conducted "on the square," and within the limits of the law. I thank the committee for its courtesies.

[Tobacco, New York, February 6, 1908.]

TRUST'S GUERRILLA WARFARE—DASTARDLY METHODS BY WHICH DUKE AND HIS ASSOCIATES HAVE ASSAILED COMPETITORS ABLY SET FORTH IN REPORT PREPARED BY HUGH CAMPBELL.

The following masterly arraignment of the vicious methods of the tobacco trust during the past four or five years was presented by Hugh Campbell at the recent annual meeting of the Independent Manufacturers' Association of the United States. Mr. Campbell, who was subsequently made president of the organization, presented a report as vice-president, which was substantially as follows:

This has unquestionably been the most eventful year in the history of the tobacco business since the formation of the American Tobacco Company in 1890, for during the year the Government has taken an active part in controlling the operations of the tobacco trust. At our meeting held in Philadelphia on December 12, 13, and 14, 1904, a committee was appointed to ask the attention of the Government to what we considered the unfair and illegal methods pursued by the American Tobacco Company in its determination to monopolize the tobacco business not only of this country, but of the world.

Your committee, as instructed, called upon the Attorney-General of the United States and were assured that our complaint would have due consideration. Soon thereafter Mr. Henry W. Taft, of New York, was appointed special attorney-general to investigate the business and methods of the American Tobacco Company and its allied companies, and in a very short time he had gathered facts enough to satisfy himself that the methods of the tobacco trust were contrary to law, and he then instituted the licorice suit. If you independent manufacturers will recall our position in the spring of 1905, you will remember that each and every one of us felt that the greatest menace hovering over our heads at that time was the control which the American Tobacco Company had acquired over the licorice business, for without licorice we could not continue our business, and licorice we could only get from tobacco trust owned or controlled concerns.

We had the price of licorice paste advanced from 6 cents to 10 cents per pound, and it was very evident that, if the licorice trust had the power and the right to make these advances, it could have gone on advancing to any figure it pleased, or it could have refused to sell us altogether. As a New York attorney in a recent tobacco case, with which we are all familiar, said: "It is my client's right to sell or not to sell, just as it chose, and it had the right to refuse to sell for any reason or for no reason at all."

It is therefore to my mind self-evident that had it not been for Mr. Taft's prompt, masterly, and unrelenting action against the licorice companies, many of us would ere this have been driven out of business for want of licorice. You know the result of that licorice trial; and while it may not give you your licorice without cost, it enables you now to get your supply at a price you can pay and still remain in business.

In the course of this licorice suit a most important decision was rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, by which it became obligatory upon the defendants to furnish the Government with any records or papers which might be called for, and under this decision there was brought out in the licorice trial correspondence which astounded us, but which pales into insignificance before that brought out recently in New York in the equity suit.

After the licorice trial, Mr. Taft reluctantly retired from the tobacco trust prosecution. He had given nearly two years of indefatigable work to it, and by his efforts had insured us the right to live, and for all time we shall owe Mr. Taft a debt of gratitude for his devotion to this case and the preservation of our business.

PROSECUTOR TAFT'S WORTHY SUCCESSOR.

After Mr. Taft's retirement from the case, happily the Government found a worthy successor, and Hon. J. C. McReynolds was appointed to carry on the good work, and after careful investigation and much study he filed the bill in equity which is now pending, and which has already brought great relief to the tobacco business in this country, bringing to light many heretofore hidden mysteries, so that now we know why certain competitors were able to spend and squander money as if it was water in their efforts to get our business from us.

TOBACCO TRUST'S CHANGE FOR THE WORSE.

A few years ago it would have been inconceivable to suppose that any great corporation such as the American Tobacco Company would stoop to the miserable meannesses that have characterized its course against competitors from 1903 until Mr. McReynolds filed his bill in equity.

The Battle Axe fight, while fierce and relentless and succesful in its object, was still conducted in the open by the American Tobacco Company on one hand, and the then great independent manufacturers, Liggett & Myers, Drummond, Lorillard, Sorg, Finzer, and Daniel Scotten, on the other, but the American Tobacco Company met these competitors in open combat, for it had not then learned the art of guerrilla warfare which it has waged against us since 1903.

REVOLT BEGAN IN CHICAGO.

In 1902 Chicago dealers became stirred up at the threatened invasion of their city by the United Cigar Stores Company, and formed, as you will remember, an association to fight for the preservation of their business.

A member of that association came to Richmond, Va., and at his request a few manufacturers there met him and listened to an enthusiastic address from him, and upon his suggestion a local independent tobacco manufacturers' association was then and there formed. Later it was determined to call a meeting of all the independent tobacco manufacturers in the United States, to be held in Washington, and accordingly we met in January, 1903, and formed this association.

Our first endeavor was to gain relief from Congress from the obnoxious practice that had grown into our business of giving coupons on the side, and through the action of the association the Otjen bill was successfully carried through the House of Representatives by a large majority, but was blocked in the United States Senate.

TOBACCO TRUST SPIES IN THE ORGANIZATION.

Our association was then enthusiastically in favor of that bill and the tobacco trust as determinedly opposed to it, but before another meeting of our association the tobacco trust had acquired ownership or control of quite a number of our members, and when we again met in Washington December 10 and 11, 1903, it was ably and numerously represented at our meeting.

In August of that year it had acquired a two-thirds interest in the R. A. Patterson Tobacco Company, of which the then president of our association was vice-president; it had a large interest in Nall & Williams, which was represented by Mr. Bow; it had a large interest in the company which John W. Brown represented; it owned the Bland Tobacco Company, of Petersburg, which R. P. Hamilton represented; it owned Spencer Brothers, of Martinsville, which Mr. Spencer represented; it owned Lipfert, Scales & Co., which Mr. Lipfert represented; and, in addition to these secretly owned or controlled manufacturers, since our previous meeting it had openly bought the business of several others of our members, notably Butler & Bosher Co., of Richmond, and B. Leidersdorf & Co., of Milwaukee.

At that meeting it was charged that we had "wolves in sheep's clothing" in our midst, and therefore it was necessary that we should establish some qualification of membership, but with the cards stacked against us the proposition was of course voted down.

A year afterwards, at our Philadelphia meeting, this requirement was successfully carried, which marked the beginning of the end, for, like snow in summer, these secretly owned concerns disappeared from our membership.

ASSOCIATION PURGED OF TRAITORS.

While we may not since then have been numerically as strong as we were before, we have been able to speak out at our meetings freely and fully and frankly, and without fear of a traitor being by our side.

Since the summer of 1903 every one of us had to meet the relentless, vindictive, and vicious competition of these apparently independent but secretly owned and subsidized companies, posing before the trade of the United States as independents like ourselves, damning the tobacco trust and apparently fighting it, while secretly reporting to it every move we made.

DULA'S DASTARDLY INCITEMENTS TO TREACHERY.

The developments brought out by the Government suit against the tobacco trust are appalling, and one wonders at the exhibition of "man's inhumanity to man." During December some of the correspondence between two of the vice-presidents of the American Tobacco Company and these secretly owned concerns was unearthed, and from these letters it appears that, beginning in 1903, Nall & Williams were subsidized and paid 2 cents per pound on everything they sold by the American Tobacco Company, and all through the correspondence with Mr. Middleton and Mr. Bow Mr. Dula "suggested" to them how they could get the business away from certain independent manufacturers or prevent them from getting business in new territory.

He also "advised" them of new brands to get up for competition and what to do in regard to the corner in burley tobacco, which the tobacco trust engineered in 1904, and while he was carrying on this correspondence, directing his letters to Mr. Middleton's house, he was in regular correspondence with M. C. Patterson, president of the R. A. Patterson Tobacco Company, "advising" him what to do in the way of getting up new brands and going after the business of independent manufacturers after trying in vain to buy them up.

"PERCY" HILL'S HAND IN THE DIRTY WORK.

He was also doing the same thing with R. P. Hamilton, of the Bland Tobacco Company, Petersburg, and while Mr. Dula was following up these concerns, Percival S. Hill was directing the Queen City Tobacco Company in its onslaught upon the Day and Night Tobacco Company, of Cincinnati, and was also instructing Mr. Carter, of the Wells-Whitehead Tobacco Company, what to do in the independent cigarette business.

KNIFING INDEPENDENTS AT SHORT RANGE.

Each and every one of these apparently independent concerns were pushing their business throughout this country as independent tobacco manufacturers, using the union label and pretending to belong to our camp, and were therefore able to knife us at short range, and keep the jobbers and retailers of the country stirred up so that they did not know where they were at.

TRUST DETERMINED TO KILL COMPETITORS.

This correspondence, which has been read into the record of this suit in equity, is so surprising, revealing the determination on the part of the tobacco trust officials, where they could not buy off a competitor, to kill him off, that we wonder at the state of mind to which these men brought themselves, living and doing business in this free country, and the only explanation we can find of it is that they were so drunk with their success that they felt themselves superior to all law and immune from its enforcement, but, thank God, the Government still lives, and we have at its head a President who believes in fair play and is determined that you and I shall have the right to do business so long as it is decent, honest, and legitimate.

The most determined and vindictive onslaught against a competitor, as thus far developed by this trial, and as was previously well known to many of us, was that which the Queen City Tobacco Company, of Cincinnati, waged against the Day and Night Tobacco Company.

CONDOLING WITH POOR FRIEDLANDER.

From the day that company was formed it waged warfare, regardless of cost, helping the tobacco trust to run up the price of raw material while keeping down the price of the manufactured article, and, when cigar clippings had gone up from 7½ to 25 cents, changed its package from 2½ ounces for 5 cents to 3 ounces for 5 cents. Then Mr. Galbraith consoled with Mr. Friedlander and lamented the unprofitableness of business, and Friedlander, still thinking that Galbraith was independent, gave himself away, and, finding that he had to either sell or face ruin, surrendered.

TRUST BUSHWHACKERS IN AMBUSH.

It was my privilege during December to hear a good deal of the testimony taken in this Government suit against the American Tobacco Company and its allied companies, and to learn by that testimony of the machinations of the tobacco trust in open warfare and of its bushwhackers in ambush fighting us in the rear, and it is simply marvelous to me that we are here, still free and independent and in a position to carry on our business.

INDEPENDENTS' LONG, WEARY STRUGGLE.

It has been a long and weary fight from the summer of 1903 until the summer of 1907, which this association has conducted in order to get these secretly trust-owned "independent" manufacturers unmasked, but, happily, that is now being accomplished.

During the taking of testimony recently in the equity suit I was glad to hear, and I am sure you will be glad to know, that the former president of this association, John Landstreet, did not know of the secret ownership of the R. A. Patterson Tobacco Company until the spring of 1905, but to my mind this places the American Tobacco Company in a position all the more reprehensible because, while, according to Mr. Dula's testimony, Mr. Landstreet did not know of this secret ownership, the American Tobacco Company did know that Mr. Landstreet was president of our Independent Tobacco Manufacturers' Association, and it allowed him to continue president of the association from August, 1903, until February, 1905, and there are no words in the English language sufficiently strong to stigmatize as they should the duplicity thus practiced.

LANDSTREET AND BOW CONTRASTED.

Some of you will recall Mr. Landstreet's scathing arraignment at our meeting in December, 1903, of anyone who could be so low, so demean himself, as to be present with us if the tobacco trust had any interest in the business he represented, and we believe that he was sincere in what he said, but we can not say as much for George Bow, representing Nail & Williams, as, while he was at that meeting hotly maintaining the independence of his company, he knew that it was not so, as he was then in regular communication with an officer of the American Tobacco Company.

HOPEFUL OUTLOOK FOR A SQUARE DEAL.

The trial of the suit in equity is still pending. It, therefore, would be impolitic, unwise, and useless to speculate as to its outcome, but already much relief has been accomplished, for which we have great cause of thankfulness, and we may rest assured that neither the tobacco trust nor any other trust will for all time be allowed to continue to do business in violation of law, and, whenever forced to conduct business according to law, we will have an opportunity of doing our business untrammelled, without fear or favor.

Sooner or later the jobbers and retailers of tobacco throughout the country will take courage and realize that the only safeguard they can establish for the perpetuation of their business lies in supporting independent tobacco manufacturers, their interests and ours being identical.

Every thinking tobacco dealer throughout the country knows full well the danger confronting his business, and still so many of them are so satisfied to live to-day that they bow the knee to the one great power in the tobacco business and steadily help it to kill off their own business.

ONLY SALVATION FOR DEALERS.

These jobbers and retailers of tobacco, if they would only allow the spirit of their forefathers to possess them, would, with American grit, fight for their inborn right to do their business in their own way, buying from whomsoever they please, and they would also appreciate the fact that, were it not for the continued existence of the stubborn few independent tobacco manufacturers, the jobbing and retailing of tobacco throughout the United States would soon be altogether in the hands of the tobacco trust and its retail stores, the United Cigar Stores Company, and, realizing this, they would push the sale of the goods which it is clearly to their best interest they should push, namely, those manufactured by really and truly independent tobacco manufacturers.

TRUST'S SIGNAL DEFEAT IN BAY STATE.

I had expected that the appeal of the American Tobacco Company in the Plymouth County case would have been argued in the Supreme Court of the United States by this time, but I am advised that the American Tobacco Company has abandoned that appeal, and now the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts stands, and after fighting since 1900 the tobacco trust has thrown up its hands and admits that, in Massachusetts at least, it can not make it a condition of sale that the buyer shall not buy like goods from another.

LAW BORN OF TRUST INTOLERANCE.

Some of you will recall that in 1900 all goods of certain independent manufacturers were thrown out by jobbers in New England, and those jobbers were prohibited from buying any new brands of any independent manufacturers. The Massachusetts legislature passed a bill for the "protection of traders," prohibiting the tobacco trust from continuing its restrictions, and from the passage of that bill until 1904 we had free trade in New England.

Then, having secured control of so large a number of manufacturers doing business in that territory, evidently the tobacco trust thought that it could do as it would, and in January, 1904, you and I and every other independent manufacturer doing business in New England had our goods thrown out by 99 per cent of the jobbers in that territory.

GREAT VICTORY FOR INDEPENDENTS.

In May, 1904, Asa P. French, then district attorney of Plymouth County, at the instance of the attorney of this association, Paul R. Blackmur, summoned before his grand jury the jobbers of tobacco in this county, resulting in the indictment of the representative of the tobacco trust. In October, 1904, the case was tried and conviction secured. The tobacco trust appealed, and, on some technicalities, the appeal was sustained, and the case had to be tried over again, resulting in another conviction, which was amply sustained in a most able decision rendered by Judge Knowlton, of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and I congratulate this association upon the final result reached in that long-fought litigation.

TRUST MAGNATES SEE THEIR DANGER.

The farmers and mechanics of this country are fast opening their eyes to the might and power of the ballot box, and it is inconceivable that for any length of time a few trusts, dominated by a few men, are going to be allowed either to rule or ruin this country, for the American people will not be made serfs, and the sooner a few magnates of the country realize this the better for them. They had a little preliminary taste during the past few months, and so sure as they persist in their combination, monopolies, and disregard of the rights of others, so surely will a day of atonement be reached.

ANTITRUST LAWS IN MANY STATES.

Many of the States have passed acts prohibiting a railroad company from buying or acquiring any interest in a parallel or competing line, and this surely is sound policy viewed from the standpoint of the greatest good to the greatest number, and in these days of antitrust agitation it seems to me that the time has come for the National Government to exercise control over the large industrial corporations of the country, and that a law should be enacted making it illegal for any industrial corporation, which has 40 or 50 per cent of the business in the United States in the article which it manufactures or in which it trades, from buying up a competitor, and it should also be made illegal for a great corporation to sell goods at a less price in one part of the country than it does in another.

TRUST METHODS OF KILLING COMPETITION.

You and I have seen the tobacco trust give goods away for nothing, sometimes less than nothing in one locality, in order to accomplish its nefarious purpose of killing a competitor, or so demoralizing him that he would sell out.

If the business of the country is to be preserved for the people of the country, if young men are still to have the inspiration, encouragement, and hope their fathers had of one day being in business for themselves, then the growth by fair means or foul of these great trusts must be restrained.

If our legislators are wise they will now take time by the forelock and pass a law controlling combinations, and not delay until the people become desperate and wanton destruction and waste ensue. A fair index to what may be expected is now taking place in Kentucky.

INIQUITIES OF THE GIFT COUPON.

In January, 1903, this association took an active part in bringing to the attention of Congress the iniquities of the coupon system in connection with the tobacco business, coupons being placed in smoking tobacco and tags upon plug tobacco for redemption, so that when a man bought a package of smoking or a piece of plug tobacco he acquired a small to-be-divided interest in a needle or an anchor, a shot gun or an automobile.

A bill was introduced by Mr. Otjen and passed the House of Representatives, but was held up in the Senate. At the following session another bill was introduced, but by that time the tobacco trust had a grip upon the throat of our association, and as an association we did nothing in favor of the bill, and it was voted down in the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

TOBACCO TRUST FOOLED CONGRESS.

At the hearings before that committee the tobacco trust did not openly appear in person, but instead it had officers of apparently independent concerns, but which it owned, appear at the hearings before that Ways and Means Committee in opposition to the bill, one of the most active being R. P. Hamilton, of the Bland Tobacco Company, Petersburg, which company was at that time entirely owned by the American Tobacco Company, and yet he had the audacity to argue before that committee that his business would be greatly injured and that the act would be a great wrong to his independent concern.

BOW SNEEZED WHEN DUKE TOOK SNUFF.

George D. Bow, representing Nail & Williams, also came to Washington to work against the bill. The officers of the tobacco trust and others in authority at 111 Fifth avenue wrote to the officers of nearly all its secretly owned or controlled concerns to become active in opposition to this anticoupon bill, using their best efforts with their Congressmen against the measure, and so, with a great many apparently independent concerns protesting against the bill, the Ways and Means Committee was naturally led to suppose that the independent manufacturers were by no means united, whereas the fact developed that at that time there were only two really independent manufacturers in the United States, so far as we can ascertain, who were earnestly against that measure.

THE NEW TAWNEY ANTICOUPON BILL.

Congressman TAWNEY has again agreed to introduce a bill to rid the country of this obnoxious practice, to stop giving something on the side, and I now recommend that we take up this anticoupon question and settle it once and for all time, and get it behind us.

I would also recommend to the association that it consider whether or not it is possible to bring the tobacco warehouses of Louisville and Cincinnati to realize that their present method of sampling tobacco is outrageously unjust, a large proportion of the samples drawn being utterly unlike the hogsheads from which they are taken, and at times the wonder is where the samples come from.

The association should also consider the free-leaf bill, which is again before Congress, and arrange to have its passage opposed, for should it become law it will surely injure the tobacco-manufacturing business and fall utterly to benefit the farmer.

TOBACCO TRUST OUGHT TO BE BROKEN.

Undoubtedly the tobacco trust has the farmers in a tight grip. When it comes to pass that there is virtually but one buyer for such a product as tobacco, it is time to do something besides assail trusts in our party platforms and on our campaign stumps. The power of such a monopoly ought to be broken.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

TOBACCO TRUST BREEDS ANARCHY.

The anarchy in the Kentucky tobacco counties, where night riders set fire to the tobacco warehouses of the tobacco trust and destroyed them, is the logical sequel to the methods of the tobacco trust, which has forced down the price of tobacco so that there is no profit in raising it. Tobacco which was worth $15 was hammered down to $3. There can be no defense of the lawlessness of the Kentucky tobacco growers. But what shall be said of the actions of the tobacco trust, which has exasperated these men and finally driven them into lawlessness? The American people will ultimately have to grapple with this trust. There are men in Paterson, like Bernard Feeney and others, whom it has driven out of a profitable business which took them years to build up. But they couldn't buck the tobacco trust and were forced out.—Paterson News.

BACKSTAIRS INTRIGUES OF TRUST—PROMINENT SOUTHERN NEWSPAPER'S COMMENT ON DISCLOSURES AT TRIAL NOW IN PROGRESS.

The tobacco trust does not appear to good advantage in some of the disclosures of its methods recently made by its own officers. The spectacle is not a nice one of business men of good repute secretly selling their factories to the combine, continuing to proclaim that their enterprises are independent of the trust, entering into the councils and partaking in the confidence of the independent association, and generally posing as disconnected from and inimical to the interest which really owns them body and soul. It is an unsavory development in whatever light regarded.

[Tobacco, New York, January 30, 1908.]

TOBACCO TRUST BREEDS CIVIL WAR.

The contest between the tobacco trust and the Tobacco Growers' Association in Kentucky has grown to the proportions of a civil war. The tobacco growers have organized bands of "night riders," which have destroyed about $1,000,000 of property, killed several people, and terrorized the tobacco-growing regions of the State. Governor Willson states in his inaugural address that the tobacco trade of the State is paralyzed, and all other kinds of business affected; the price of land has gone down and people are leaving the State. Vigorous measures are being taken to protect the property in the larger tobacco warehouse centers, but the farmers in the country are helpless and in terror of their lives. The cause of the trouble was the efforts of the tobacco trust to force down prices by driving all other buyers out of the market. Those who wished to buy tobacco were assigned a district in which alone they would be allowed to buy, and no other buyer was allowed to operate in that district. Competition was thus killed and the tobacco growers were obliged to take what they could get, and it was claimed that prices were forced below the cost of production. In desperation the growers formed an association in connection with the Farmers' League of America, and the association has forbidden any grower selling his crop below a certain price. The violence has been directed against the farmers who were obliged or ventured to sell their tobacco contrary to the demands of the association, and against the warehouses of the tobacco trust. The contest involves the same principles which enter into conflict between employers and labor unions over the question of the open shop. The tobacco growers were certainly in a hard plight and little sympathy can be felt for the tobacco trust.—The Watchman, organ of the Baptist denomination.

JAMES B. DUKE LOOKED WORRIED—TOBACCO TRUST HEAD WATCHES WELDING OF CHAIN OF EVIDENCE THAT MAY SEND HIM TO JAIL—SEEMED UNDER SEVERE NERVOUS STRAIN.

James B. Duke, the head of the tobacco trust, was an intent spectator this week in the United States circuit court room in New York and seemed to watch Special Attorney-General McReynolds with a sort of fascinated interest as the latter conducted the taking of evidence in the case of the United States Government against the tobacco trust.

Duke was plainly ill at ease and seemed to be laboring under severe nervous excitement. He fidgeted about constantly in his seat and frequently raised his hands to his face in an irritable manner. At other times he occupied himself by nervously tearing up scraps of paper.

The worn and weary look upon his face, which was noted when he appeared as a witness at the prosecution of some of his subordinates a little less than a year ago, has considerably intensified in the months that have since passed, although his face is somewhat more bloated than it was at that time. The hard, cynical lines about the mouth seem as prominent as ever, while the lines of worry around the eyes give the general impression of a man who regards life as a bad joke with which he is mightily wearied.

The taking of testimony before Commissioner Shields was begun last Thursday. As explained by Tobacco, Commissioner Shields merely acts as an examiner to preside over the taking of testimony and the filing of affidavits.

The usual formidable legal array put in an appearance to defend the tobacco trust, including Delancey Nicoll, W. W. Fuller, Junius B. Parker, Ex-Judge Wallace, William B. Hornblower, and S. M. Stroock. The Government was represented by Special Attorney-General McReynolds and Edwin P. Grosvenor.

W. R. Harris, vice-president of the American Tobacco Company and chairman of the board of directors of the British-American Tobacco Company, was the first witness called, as Tobacco foreshadowed last week.

Judge McReynolds then begun his volley of questioning. Mr. Harris testified that he first became identified with the trust in May, 1890.

"What large concerns engaged in the manufacture of plug and smoking tobacco in 1890 are now engaged as independent concerns?" asked Judge McReynolds.

Harris was forced to admit that at the moment he could recall none. He tried to justify his admission by stating that the American Tobacco Company lost money on plug tobacco between the years of 1893 and 1898.

"What caused this loss?" was the next pertinent question Judge McReynolds put. "The company was pushing trade," Harris replied.

"In taking over other companies, did the American Company make the other concerns agree not to sell to drummers or small dealers?" Harris was forced to admit that in most cases such an agreement had been made.

Admissions were drawn from Harris showing that by foreign consolidations the tobacco trust at one time controlled the tobacco trade of the world, save in France, Italy, Turkey, and Austria-Hungary, where the tobacco trade is a Government monopoly. Mr. Harris went on to admit that when the trust first entered England as a competitor the control of the Ogden Company (Limited) was secured. The business was continued for a time under the old name, because of the fear that doing business under the American title might hamper it.

Later the witness said, after James B. Duke and Thomas F. Ryan had made many negotiations abroad, the control of the Imperial Tobacco Company, of Great Britain and Ireland, was secured, some two years after the Ogden Company, and the two formed the British-American Tobacco Company.

"Was the Imperial Tobacco Company at the time its control was secured a paying concern?" asked Judge McReynolds. "It was," replied Mr. Harris, but he declined to give further particulars.

The witness was forced to explain further that when control was being sought in Great Britain of the tobacco trade, $1,000,000 was spent to meet competition, and that, in addition, all profits in Great Britain were turned back to the purchasers.

Judge McReynolds had already questioned Mr. Harris concerning the growth of tobacco, the proportions grown in America and other countries, and its manufacture in the United States into marketable products; thus, step by step, forcing out evidence of the growing monopoly fostered by the tobacco trust.

Frank H. Ray, one of the directors of the American Tobacco Company, was the next witness. He said that he was formerly connected with the Paul J. Sorg Company, plug tobacco manufacturers of Middletown, Ohio. He stated that the first consolidation was effected through the formation of the Continental Tobacco Company, afterwards merged with the American. Mr. Ray testified that there had been at one time considerable competition between the plug manufacturers. Mr. Ray then explained the absorption of the Sorg Company by the Continental and the negotiations between that company and the American Company.

T. B. Yuille, head of the leaf-buying department of the American Tobacco Company, was called by Judge McReynolds Monday and questioned at great length concerning the growth of leaf in the South, the numerous tobacco markets in the South, the different kinds of tobacco, and the proportion of the output the tobacco trust controlled.

W. K. Smith, a stockholder in several companies of the tobacco trust, was called and questioned concerning the state of affairs since the trust began its attempt to monopolize the tobacco trade.

Percival S. Hill, vice-president of the American Cigar Company and president of S. Anargyros, was on the stand Tuesday and Wednesday.

The hearing is held in room 124, fourth floor of the Post-Office Building, and is open to the public.

TRUST SAILING UNDER FALSE COLORS—OPENS UNITED CIGAR STORE IN DES MOINES, IOWA, WHICH POSES AS AN ANTITRUST ESTABLISHMENT.

[Special to Tobacco.]

DES MOINES, November 25.

The tobacco trust recently entered into negotiations for opening one of its retail stores in Des Moines and caused the matter to be heralded in the local newspapers as the entrance of a big antitrust concern into Des Moines. The local newspapers also referred to the United Cigar Stores Company as has having been organized a few years ago to fight the tobacco trust.

The tobacco trust has often heralded its National Stands branch as organized to fight those who created it, but, so far as is known, this is the first time that the trust has ever brazenly proclaimed that the United Cigar Stores were created to fight the trust which actually owns and controls $1,350,000 of the United Stores' $1,650,000 capitalization, as well as $2,850,000 of the United Stores' bonded indebtedness.

It is hardly likely that the intelligent people of Des Moines will swallow the story that the United Stores was organized to fight the tobacco trust, and it is difficult to understand just why the trust should attempt any such brazen deception at this time, when both the trust and its creature, the United Stores Company, are codefendants in the suit instituted by the United States Government and now on trial in New York.

HAWKEYE.

STARVATION PRICES FOR TOBACCO.

The present situation in the tobacco-growing districts have gained frequent reference in the editorial columns of the daily newspapers of the United States during the past few months, and almost invariably the able editors have uncorked the vials of their wrath upon the heads of the tobacco farmers, at least upon that portion of them who, driven to desperation by the wicked work of the tobacco trust, have sought to better their condition by joining the various organizations formed to cooperate in securing living prices for their leaf tobacco.

These tobacco farmers have been editorially characterized as anarchists, as incendaries, as un-American, as a criminal horde, as barn burners, as midnight assassins, and a long list of foul epithets tending to hold them up to ignominy in the eyes of all good citizens.

For the moment it is unnecessary to speculate as to whether this abuse of the tobacco farmers was directly inspired by the tobacco trust, which has a crafty way of distributing fat advertising contracts to the daily newspapers at opportune times, or whether they have merely resulted from the attempts of the able editors to comment offhand upon affairs concerning which they possess a most meager knowledge.

The city of Owensboro is in the heart of the tobacco-growing district of Kentucky. The Owensboro Messenger is an able and conservative newspaper. Its editor is a man of ripe judgment and keen perceptions who has lived in that section for years. Surely his opinion should outweigh the snap judgments of editors scores and hundreds of miles away, who are ready to condemn tobacco farmers upon scanty and often most untrustworthy statements regarding the conditions in that section.

The editor of the Owensboro Messenger in a recent editorial reviews the present situation. This editorial is remarkably temperate and almost judicial in its summing up of facts.

The prosperity of Owensboro, it says, is dependent upon the prosperity of the tobacco growers; tobacco is the great staple upon which the people of that section must exist; there are no other farming products which can take the place of tobacco in that community; the manufacturing interests are insufficient to support the people.

The editorial further says: "Whatever the mistakes of the farmers, however much they may have been duped by the secret agents of the tobacco trust, it is no time to scoff at them, or to withold from them the helping hand.

"It is time for equal and exact justice. Three-cent tobacco—a starvation price—brought on this situation but a few years ago. The farmers have profited to some extent by pooling. They would have profited more if they had not split among themselves. The farmers have so far been entirely orderly in their conduct."

This is the testimony of an eyewitness, of a man who has been constantly upon the scene, and who has nothing extenuated, nor set down aught in malice. Is not his evidence to be preferred to the mere assertions of editors who know next to nothing of the real facts?

This man, keen of observation and conservative in statement, presents the damning evidence of the manner in which the tobacco farmers have been ground down beneath the iron heel of the tobacco trust. "Three-cent tobacco—a starvation price—brought on the present situation" in Kentucky.

And even in the face of such conditions there are editors who deprecate the present efforts of the United States to find a legal remedy for the pernicious activities of the tobacco trust. Had these editors lived in the days of Captain Kidd they would undoubtedly have decried the efforts of civilized nations to put a stop to piracy on the high seas.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

While representatives of the tobacco trust were recently negotiating for the lease of premises in Des Moines, Iowa, in which to install one of the trust's retail stores, the Des Moines newspapers came out with articles, which were all too evidently inspired by someone connected with the United Cigar Stores branch of the tobacco trust, stating in so many words that the former was organized for the express purpose of fighting the latter, and heralding the United Store to be opened in Des Moines as a great antitrust establishment.

Representatives of the tobacco trust have done many strange things in the past, but it is difficult to understand what they expect to gain by any such brazen, but in the long run, fruitless attempt to deceive the people of an up-to-date community like Des Moines.

The tobacco trust and the United Cigar Stores have so often and in so many different ways admitted their relationship with each other and the connection between the two is so plainly set forth in the bill of complaint filed against the two and numerous other codefendants in the suit of the United States Government that this attempt of the United Stores to sail under false colors at this late day seems inexplainable upon any reasonable hypothesis. Perhaps the deception was attempted as a joke by subordinates in the tobacco trust.

CASE LOOKS BAD FOR THE TRUST—MASS OF DAMAGING EVIDENCE BROUGHT OUT BY PROSECUTOR M'REYNOLDS—HOW DUKE SCHEMED TO DEMORALIZE IMPORTED CIGAR BUSINESS.

The suit in equity of the United States Government against the tobacco trust and everybody concerned in it continues to go merrily on.

The investigation Tuesday was devoted exclusively to snuff and the branches of the tobacco trust that make it. Special Attorney-General McReynolds summoned George W. Helme, formerly of the George W. Helme Company, which was acquired by the American Snuff Company branch of the tobacco trust.

Judge McReynolds questioned the witnesses concerning the negotiations in high finance that resulted in the acquiring of the Helme Company by the trust; how the pro rata shares were distributed, and how the capital stock was apportioned. The Government counsel drew from the snuff man many damaging admissions tending to show a monopoly.

Mr. Helme could not tell of a single independent snuff company of any size, and excused himself by saying that he had been out of the snuff business for four years. He then was forced to disclose the various secret agreements whereby various subordinates agreed to effect certain combinations. Helme told also of the fact that the various names used for snuff were usually the firm name of the manufacturer, which was also a trade-mark.

Judge McReynolds requested the witness to name the various prominent snuff manufacturers and the name of the snuff they produced, whereupon Helme admitted that every company was controlled by the American Snuff Company.

The examination went into every detail concerning who owned the stock of the Helme Company and how it was transferred to the American Snuff Company and how the members of the Helme Company received stock of the reorganized company as a tobacco-trust concern. Helme claimed that every snuff company was run independently under its corporate name.

"You wish to convey the impression that each company has a distinct management, but they are all under the direction and control of the American Snuff Company, are they not?" "They are," replied the witness.

Percival S. Hill was recalled Monday, and his testimony of last week and that day covers several hundred pages of the record. Mr. Hill was questioned concerning nearly every detail of the organization of the various companies. He was asked to explain his correspondence concerning various more or less questionable methods.

It was clearly shown by the testimony that it is an established practice of the tobacco trust, after obtaining the business and plant of a former competition, to keep the fact of the sale secret. The admission was forced by Judge McReynolds from Vice-President Hill that the tobacco trust controls the business of the Wells-Whitehead Company, of Wilson, N. C., but that the fact was concealed from the public and the company in question had sent its goods out bearing the union label. Mr. Hill would not admit the fact conveyed to the trade the impression that the company in question, the Wells-Whitehead Company, had no connection with the tobacco trust. "We always advised the Wells-Whitehead Company not to deny the ownership," Mr. Hill asserted.

The purchase of the Wells-Whitehead Company, Mr. Hill stated, had been a profitable one for the tobacco trust, except in the year 1905, when the company allowed 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 damaged cigarettes to be shipped out and afterwards had to redeem them.

Mr. Hill testified that the tobacco trust owned the Day and Night Tobacco Company, of Cincinnati, a supposedly independent concern. The fact that this ownership was not made public, he declared, was due solely to the wishes of the former sole owners, who still retained an interest. Concerning new brands of goods, Hill said they were always introduced at a loss, and that if they did not "go" after a fair trial they were abandoned.

The witness testified that a bonus had been paid the Reynolds Tobacco Company, of Bristol, Tenn., to close out, and that other factories were now making that company's former brands. A complaint by B. L. Delancey, a former stockholder of the Reynolds Tobacco Company, to the effect that he had been badly treated, was, Mr. Hill said, founded on misinformation.

Judge McReynolds intimated that B. L. Delancey, one of the heaviest stockholders in the Reynolds Tobacco Company, had been a heavy loser when the concern changed hands, but Mr. Hill insisted that Mr. Delancey was one of the best friends of the tobacco trust, whereupon Mr. McReynolds read a letter from Mr. Delancey, in which he complained of the treatment which his company had received and likened his concern to "a prisoner in chains," and called upon Mr. Hill to "break the shackles" and treat the company fairly or else let it go out of business with every possible profit to the stockholders.

RENT OF FLATIRON CIGAR STORE.

New York City retailers, Hill claimed, bought their supplies on closer margin than other dealers, and it was true that the tobacco trust had occasionally given allowances to the United Cigar Stores Company for pushing certain brands, and he recalled two instances in which allowances had been made on rentals, but denied that the American Company had ever paid part of the rent of the Flatiron Building store or was concerned in any way with the coupon scheme. He was compelled to admit, however, that the tobacco trust made a practice of lending money to jobbers throughout the country who pushed the company's products.

Mr Hill was forced to admit that the tobacco trust made allowances to the United Cigar Stores for advertising the goods of the trust, based upon the increased sale of the brands when pushed to the utmost by the United.

"You allow the United Cigar Stores Company a discount of 2 per cent and an allowance of 5 per cent, do you not?" asked Judge McReynolds. "Yes," replied the witness. "How is the allowance determined?" "It is fixed by results." "Do you give a trade allowance on rent?" "It has been done in case a desirable territory for the introduction of our products was to be developed."

"Don't you pay the United Cigar Stores Company's rent in the Flatiron Building?" "No, sir. Not one cent, and we never did."

"Do any of the companies connected with the American Tobacco Company pay the rent?" "I can't say."

It also developed that the tobacco trust made a practice of lending money to jobbers throughout the country who were pushing its products.

BITTER ENMITY TO WARE-KRAMER TOBACCO COMPANY.

The witness asserted that he had never taken any active part in the affairs of the Wells-Whitehead Company, but was forced to admit that he felt free to make suggestions at any time. He admitted that he, as secretary of the American Tobacco Company, received daily reports from the Wells-Whitehead Company as to the sale of cigarettes and monthly reports as to the financial condition.

A letter addressed to W. M. Carter, of Wilson, N. C., taken from Mr. Hill's letter book, is extremely interesting, and shows the trust's concerted atempts to cripple the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Company, manufacturers of the White Rolls cigarettes. The letter read as follows:

"We are advised that a carload of cigarettes has been exported to China by the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Company. If possible I wish you would ascertain to what port these goods were shipped and the name of the consignee. If you can not learn the name, perhaps you can find out the markings on the cases, as well as the point in this country from which the goods were shipped by steamer.

"P. S. H."
[Percival S. Hill.]

The above letter was introduced just after Hill had protested at great length how friendly the tobacco trust was to the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Company, and would much rather see them succeed in business than otherwise. The letter came as a rude shock. Hill was forced to admit that he transmitted any information which he may have received to the British-American Tobacco Company, with the avowed object of shutting off the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Company's market in China. Such surprising reversals of form were by no means uncommon during Hill's testimony.

Another letter concerning White Rolls cigarettes, dictated at the tobacco trust headquarters, had the following interesting passage: "Regarding White Rolls, I hear they are selling some in Petersburg. Thought same to have dropped out for a time, but recently their men have been there again and started up some sales. I wish you could have this looked into, and see that some work is done there on Carolina Brights to counteract their effect in that locality."

Other letters of a similar character referring to the great increase in the sale of White Rolls in Durham, N. C., and in Danbury, Conn., were also offered in testimony, disclosing the merciless campaigning of the tobacco trust against the White Rolls cigarette and its ferocious competition against the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Company. Most of the letters are addressed to W. M. Carter or R. C. Briggs, of the Wells-Whitehead Company.

ATTACK ON CENTRAL UNION BRAND.

Hill was also questioned concerning other correspondence concerning Union Leader, a tobacco which was gotten out by the tobacco trust to drive Central Union, an independent tobacco, out of the market. Hill in his letters had complained that in a canvass by his men around lower New York City he had found Union Leader featured in only 24 stores out of 490 entered, while Central Union was in them all. The letters admit that the tobacco trust put out Union Leader especially to kill the Central Union tobacco.

Among the important questions also put to Mr. Hill were the following: "What is the attitude of union labor organization toward the American Tobacco Company? "I don't know."

"Is it not true that they will not grant the union label to the products of factories controlled directly by the American Tobacco Company?" "I think not, but I don't know what you mean by 'controlled directly.'"

CATCHING HILL IN A TRAP.

Judge McReynolds then took up the relations between the tobacco trust and the United Cigar Stores in detail. "When was the United Cigar Stores Company organized?" he asked. "I don't remember," was the answer.

"Why was the ownership denied or concealed?"

"It never was denied or concealed. It simply was not made public."

At this point Judge McReynolds read a letter which the witness admitted he wrote to Frederick Estabrook, of Estabrook & Eaton, tobacco dealers, of Boston, September 29, 1902, in which he stated that it would be desirable to deny all rumors that the American Tobacco Company was behind the United Cigar Stores Company.

"Was it common to make such denials?"

"That is the only thing of the kind I know of."

Another important phase of Hill's testimony was concerning the business methods of the Metropolitan Tobacco Company, the corporation which enjoys exclusive jobbing relation with the tobacco trust.

"Does your company sell to any retailer in New York besides the United Cigar Stores Company?" asked Judge McReynolds.

"No; it sells to the New York trade through the Metropolitan Tobacco Company," was the answer.

"Are your city sales made on a uniform discount?"

"Practically so; but the discount actually varies. Tobacco is sold to the Metropolitan Company at list prices less 2 per cent; with an allowance of 5 per cent."

"What do you mean by allowance as distinguished from discount?"

"We make various allowances to companies that handle our goods and encourage the sale of our products and see that retail customers are supplied readily."

Mr. McReynolds then endeavored to get an idea of advertising methods and money expended in that way, but the witness's memory was so defective that little progress was made. Hill did say, however, that his estimate for 1906 was about $10,000,000 spent in advertising and "the promotion of various schemes."

"How much was paid for newspaper advertisements?" asked Judge McReynolds.

"I don't know," replied the witness. "In 1906? I can not say positively, but I should think about $100,000 or $150,000."

"Is that all that was spent on newspaper advertising?"

"That is my estimate for the American Tobacco Company. The subsidiary companies have their separate items."

SCHEME TO CORNER SCRAP MARKET.

At another time Mr. Hill was forced to disclose an attempt to accomplish a combination of "scrap" tobacco among its manufacturers. A letter written by Mr. Hill to Mr. Pinkerton, of Milwaukee, telling of the attempts of Mr. Friedlander to establish such a combination was introduced by Judge McReynolds. Mr. Hill stated that personally he thought the plan a good one, but admitted that all of the manufacturers of scrap tobacco would not come in, hence the failure of the attempted corner.

DUKE'S PLOT TO DEMORALIZE TRADE.

This decidedly interesting letter, written by Percival S. Hill, in New York, January 16, 1903, to J. B. Cobb, president of the American Cigar Company, who was then in Habana, was introduced. James B. Duke ordered Hill to write it:

"DEAR MR. COBB: At Mr. Duke's suggestion I write you to the effect that a plan has about been decided upon, which differs from the one that was being considered before you left, and as in carrying out this plan it will be undesirable to give control of any brands to individuals in any part of the country, Mr. Duke requests me to write you, explaining it, so that in case any of our customers go to Habana you will not promise them control of any special brand.

"Mr. Rothschild, of the Waldorf-Astoria, will go to Habana to-morrow, Saturday, and we understand he will try to make arrangements to secure other Habana cigars than ours. Mr. Duke's idea is to make a confidential arrangement with Park & Tilford, and Acker, Merrall & Condit, by which they will sell Habana cigars both to the consumer and the retailer at the present cost, so that the retailer will buy at exactly the same prices as the consumer. Of course it will be necessary to keep this matter entirely confidential. The result will be a demoralization in business, for such a length of time as may be deemed desirable to continue on this basis.

"The final upshot will be that the importers will be forced into an arrangement by which they will maintain prices agreed upon. This plan is considered more desirable for the reason that if we tried to regulate the prices at the present time it would mean an advance in our goods to both wholesaler and retailer, which would give a decided advantage to independent factories in securing business; but we feel when our goods are sold to the consumer at present cost there will be no more opportunity to get much business for independent factories.

"Mr. Duke expects to have an interview with Park & Tilford to-day, to ascertain if this plan will be carried out by them.

"Will you kindly extend my regards to Mrs. Cobb and her daughter? Remember me to all the folks in Habana. With sincere regards for yourself, believe me,

"Very truly, PERCIVAL S. HILL."

HILL'S LAME DEFENSE OF THE TRUST—TESTIMONY SO FULL OF HOLES AND EVASIONS A BACKWOODS LAW STUDENT COULD PICK IT TO PIECES.

There was a great foregathering of the bright lights of the tobacco trust legal department at Stamford, Conn., last Sunday, where they wined, dined, and automobiled, and between times framed up a series of questions to be put to Percival S. Hill in the Government case when Special Attorney-General McReynolds should turn the witness over to them.

Judge McReynolds turned Hill over to Junius Parker, of the tobacco trust counsel, Monday, and according to the report in the Evening Sun of that date, the following amazing dialogue ensued:

"How many retail stores are there in the United States?"

"About 600,000."

"Of these how many are owned by the United Cigar Stores Company?"

"Less than 1,000."

[Admitting for the sake of argument that there are 600,000 places in the United States where cigars and tobacco are retailed, it is safe to assume that more than 560,000 of the number are in places where they are handled only as a side line, and usually in comparatively insignificant quantities. Of the remaining 40,000 places, many of them lead only a hand-to-mouth existence. There are something like 100 of the retail stores of the tobacco trust in Greater New York, and it is estimated that within the past five years they have driven some 500 independent dealers out of business.—Editor of Tobacco.]

"How many distributing concerns are there?"

"At least 5,000."

"How many of these does the American Tobacco Company own?"

"Only one."

In the bill of complaint filed by the United States Government against the tobacco trust, the following distributing concerns are named as codefendants, and the trust has in effect admitted that it owned and controlled them:

Crescent Cigar and Tobacco Company, New Orleans, capital $20,000.
M. Blaskower Company, San Francisco, capital $500,000.
R. D. Burnett Cigar Company, Birmingham, Ala.; capital $415,000.
Cliff Weil Cigar Company, Richmond, Va.; capital $50,000.
J. & B. Mocs, Chicago, capital $150,000.
The J. & B. Moos Company, Cincinnati, capital $200,000.
Dusel, Goodloe & Co., Philadelphia, capital $72,000.
J. J. Goodrum Tobacco Company, Atlanta, Ga.; capital $60,000.
Jordan, Gibson & Baum (Incorporated), Memphis, Tenn.; capital $50,000.
Louisiana Tobacco Company (Limited), New Orleans, capital $50,000.
The Smokers' Paradise Company, Atlantic City, N. J., $75,000.

The above list takes no account of the Metropolitan Tobacco Company, of New York, which is as actually dominated by the tobacco trust as the fingers on Duke's right hand are dominated by Duke; neither is any account taken of the long line of branches and subsidiary concerns that are in turn controlled by the Metropolitan Tobacco Company and the various other concerns listed above. Nor is any reference made to the long list of concerns like the Acker, Merrall & Condit Company, in which the tobacco trust is a heavy stockholder, and which it permits to handle the brands of independent manufacturers only when it is scheming to kill such brands.

[Furthermore, the testimony framed up for Percival S. Hill, as above quoted, is intended to divert attention from one of the most important and vital phases of the whole matter, and that is: Before the Metropolitan Tobacco Company came into existence there were more than 100 substantial jobbers in New York, while to-day there are perhaps five that are worthy of being so classed. Some of the former jobbers were bought up by the Metropolitan, and the others were deliberately forced out of business by the ferocious competition with which they were assailed by the Metropolitan.—Editor of Tobacco.]

"Out of the 5,000 how many receive allowances from your company?"

"Two hundred and fifty-three."

"Nearly 4,700 are perfectly free and under no influence whatever from the American Tobacco Company?"

"Exactly."

[If there are 4,700 so-called "jobbing concerns" that are not controlled by the tobacco trust, either through ownership of stock or through loans of money made by some of its subsidiary branches—which is extremely doubtful—it must be taken into consideration that many of these independent concerns have but an insignificant volume of trade, most of them doing less business in a year than the Metropolitan Tobacco Company does in a single day. Furthermore, a large majority of these independent jobbers handle vastly more goods produced by the tobacco trust than they do of the products of the independent dealers.—Editor of Tobacco.]

"Out of the 5,000 distributing companies, do any handle exclusively the products of the American Tobacco Company?"

"Not one; not even the one owned by us."

[As a matter of fact, it has from the beginning been the practice of the tobacco trust distributers and dealers to take hold of the product of an independent manufacturer, and make a pretense of selling it for the express purpose of killing the sale of a competitive brand. Quite recently the tobacco trust has made strenuous efforts to get possession of large quantities of the Romeo y Julieta brand of imported cigars, which it had planned to discredit with the smoker by selling them at cut prices in the trust's retail stores. Another instance in which one of the tobacco trust jobbers handled the cigarettes of an independent manufacturer only to kill them was also of recent occurrence. The cigarettes, which are wrapped in tin-foil, were treated to a few drops of water in each package, which caused them to turn black and then mold. The tin foil prevented the packages from presenting other than the ordinary appearance until the foil was removed, when the smoker naturally became disgusted with what he found and was probably effectually deterred from calling for that brand of cigarettes in the future. Similar instances in which the branches of the tobacco trust have handled the products of the independent manufacturers for the purpose of killing them might be multiplied indefinitely.—Editor of Tobacco.]

"Then there is no reason why other companies should not be able to compete openly?"

"None at all. Even from the 253 companies to which we pay allowances for promoting the sale of our goods they can get almost as much as we can. There is nothing to prevent any merchant from going into business except money."

[Every intelligent member of the trade knows that not only is it impossible for independent manufacturers to get the same service from the jobbers who have been assimilated by the tobacco trust that could be obtained from practically every jobber in the old days. There have been not merely scores and hundreds, but thousands of instances, where the jobbers controlled by the tobacco trust have positively refused to fill substantial orders booked by the salesmen for independent manufacturers and offering the jobber a handsome profit without risk or exertion on his part.—Editor of Tobacco.]

"Can anyone get the products of the American Tobacco Company?"

"Certainly, if he has the money; that is, outside of New York. Here they must get them through the Metropolitan Company."

[The tobacco trust has for several years past made a strenuous legal fight against E. Locker & Co. to establish its contention that it can refuse to sell its goods to anybody for any reason, or for no reason at all.—Editor of Tobacco.]

"Independent manufacturers of tobacco have opened business since the American Tobacco Company was formed, have they not?"

"Yes; several."

"And they are for the most part prosperous?"

"Very."

[It is doubtful if the witness, or anyone else, could name three prosperous independent manufacturers of tobacco in any form other than cigars or little cigars that have come into existence in the past seven years.—Editor of Tobacco.]

The lawyer then named the Scotten & Dillon Company, of Detroit; the Harris Company, of Readsville, N. C.; Bagley & Co., and the Globe Tobacco Company, of Detroit; Bloch Bros., of Wheeling, and the Dill Company, of Richmond, all of which the witness agreed were old-established companies and still prosperous. Failures in the tobacco business, said Mr. Hill, are due to bad management.

"Why, 90 per cent of our own products are failures," the witness added.

[Judging from the lack of quality in many of the tobacco trust's brands, there is not the slightest reason for doubting this statement.—Editor of Tobacco.]

The witness said that it had always been difficult to establish new brands on the market. Ninety per cent of the American company's business depended on fifty brands out of their total of 1,500, he said.

[Fully nineteen out of twenty of the largest selling brands of the tobacco trust to-day were placed on the market and established by independent concerns that have been since absorbed by the trust.—Editor of Tobacco.]

Counselor Parker then took up the manufacture and marketing of the various brands and endeavored to show that there could be nothing short of real competition, since brands could not be duplicated by other companies.

"Each brand has a secret formula, and my understanding is that it is impossible to duplicate them," said Mr. Hill.

[He might with equal reason have said: "The moon is made of green cheese."—Editor of Tobacco.]

PROGRESSIVE CROOKEDNESS—RECORD OF TOBACCO-TRUST VILLAINIES DAILY GROWS MORE AND MORE AMAZING UNDER THE PROBE OF JUDGE M'REYNOLDS.

An interesting feature in the proceedings in equity instituted by the United States Government against the tobacco trust last Tuesday was the recalling of Percival S. Hill, vice-president of the trust, whose testimony has been fraught with so many inconsistencies when compared with his personal correspondence of the past few years. Hill was called to verify some letters written to him by one Craft, of New Orleans. The letters disclosed a concerted attempt to put the Craft company out of business.

The fake independent companies, namely, Queen City Tobacco Company, Michigan Tobacco Company, and the Craft Tobacco Company, which were falsely masquerading as independents, were the chief topics of discussion Tuesday.

Admissions were drawn from Caleb C. Dula as to the secret workings of each company; how they tried to keep up an appearance of independence when in reality all three were owned and controlled by the tobacco trust. The correspondence between the officials of the different subordinate companies, which was submitted at this point, disclosed what frantic attempts were resorted to to allay suspicion respecting affiliation with the tobacco trust. Dula admitted that the Michigan Tobacco Company was a losing venture and estimated the financial loss at something like $100,000.

Special Attorney-General McReynolds asked Dula to explain the relations of the trust with the Mengel Box Company. Several letters, taken from correspondence between Dula and Mr. Mengel, were produced, in which Dula asked for figures of box sales to various tobacco companies not connected with the tobacco trust.

"Was it Mr. Mengel's custom to send you from time to time figures of sales to independent companies?" asked Judge McReynolds.

"No, sir," was the reply. "I can't recall that he ever sent me any such information, though in conversation he may have given me some data."

"What do these letters mean in which you ask for letters?" asked the Government prosecutor, producing certain correspondence.

"I asked," the witness was forced to admit by his own letters, "but I do not remember; but I considered that I had a right to know, as a majority stockholder."

The three companies which Mr. Dula, judging from his correspondence, wished to get the figures of respecting the number of box sales were the Monarch, People's and Friedlander companies, and the letters produced showed that these figures were asked for repeatedly.

"Did the Conley Tin Foil Company sell tin foil to the American Tobacco Company and the independent companies as well?" asked Judge McReynolds of Dula.

"I know nothing at all about its business," was the reply.

"You did not, then, receive reports from it or the licorice companies?"

"No."

Mr. Dula was temporarily excused at 10.50 o'clock Tuesday morning, and Vice-President Hill was recalled. Hill admitted that the general direction of the Craft Tobacco Company, of New Orleans, was turned over to him by Dula after the latter had reorganized it upon its acquisition by the tobacco trust. Hill stated that both the Craft Company and the People's Tobacco Company, of New Orleans, were union companies. The latter, he said, had an approximate yearly output of 7,000,000 cigarettes and 30,000 pounds of smoking tobacco.

"What was the quality of the output; rather cheap, wasn't it?" inquired the Government counsel.

"I wouldn't say that. It was not particularly cheap; it was high-priced for its quality," said Hill.

Several letters were then read which were extracted from the correspondence which was held between Hill and Craft. The letters referred more especially to the question of union labor and the efforts of Mr. Craft to keep his connection with the tobacco trust a secret.

Several letters were also referred to concerning the struggle between the two labor unions in New Orleans, the regular union and the Tobacco Workers' Union, of which a man named Ourry was at the head.

When the Craft Company was acquired by the tobacco trust, Hill admitted that Mr. Craft had 25 per cent of the stock and the trust the balance. That connection, according to Hill, lasted until the early part of the present year, when all the stock was bought outright by Craft, who now, as Hill asserted again, owns the business. The tobacco trust, according to Hill, has no longer any connection with the Craft Tobacco Company. Hill maintained that the trust never did directly dictate to Craft as to the methods he should pursue, and that the latter always conducted his business as though it belonged to him absolutely.

"Was the Craft business prosperous?" was the next question.

"Yes; but not at the expense of anybody," Hill replied. "We found it necessary to interfere occasionally," Hill was finally forced to admit, "as Mr. Craft's policy was not always the wisest. For instance, his business was hurt by antagonizing customers when he espoused the cause of prohibition."

Mr. Hill was excused at noon and Dula recalled for redirect examination by Junius Parker, attorney of record for the tobacco trust.

The hearing Monday was devoted to the methods of the tobacco trust in acquiring control of independent companies. Counselor McReynolds brought out that the American and Continental tobacco companies had furnished the money for the organization of the Queen City Tobacco Company, of Cincinnati, putting forward J. L. Richards, a Boston financier, as the apparent independent backer of the concern. It is not generally known even now that the trust controlled the Queen City, Mr. Dula admitted.

It also developed that F. W. Galbraith, jr., manager of the Queen City Company, had written to Dula to the effect that his only fear was that "in some way the connection may leak out." The writer then advised that further correspondence be conducted under assumed names and that financial matters be transacted through the Boston man. Suspicion had been aroused among the labor unions, the writer said.

"The union is out for blood," he wrote, "as they expect they are being used by the tobacco trust. I have told them that we have absolutely no connection. We will have to be very careful or the connection will be exposed."

Other correspondence over the possible disclosure of the relations between the Queen City and the tobacco trust contained the statement that the labor unions were growing more and more suspicious.

"Richards must be prepared to stand them off (the labor unions) if they camp on his trail," wrote Mr. Galbraith.

Dula told of the secret acquisition by the tobacco trust of the Manufacturers' Tobacco Company, of Louisville, and Mr. McReynolds read a letter of Dula's asking the discipline of a salesman who had informed outsiders that the Continental and American companies were interested in the Manufacturers' Tobacco Company.

In a letter of Dula's on the formation of the Craft Tobacco Company, of New Orleans, in 1903, Augustus Craft, a New York jobber, wrote: "I will not only get their business, but I expect to cause a strike in the People's Tobacco Company plant."

This letter was also placed upon the record by Mr. McReynolds, who brought out that the Craft Company employed union labor and used union labels on its products, although the tobacco trust was behind it.

Mr. Dula also told of the purchase of the Pinkerton Tobacco Company, of Zanesville, Ohio, which was made with that secrecy that characterizes all of the underhanded deals of the tobacco trust.

Among the witnesses the latter part of last week was Francis S. Kinney, the former head of the Kinney Brothers Tobacco Company, which had its factory in Twenty-second street, near Ninth avenue, New York. When the American Tobacco Company was originally organized, according to Mr. Kinney, the Kinney Company had as its principal competitors W. Duke Sons & Co., Allen & Ginter, the Kimball Tobacco Company, and the Goodwin Tobacco Company.

"Competition was pretty active, and we spent a lot of money for advertising," Mr. Kinney testified. Ultimately an agreement was arrived at, and the five companies came together, Mr. Kinney stated.

"Who originated this idea of organizing the five companies?" asked Mr. McReynolds.

"I didn't, I know," said the witness. "The five companies finally came to an agreement, after some pretty stormy times. There was a good deal of friction, and I don't know how they finally smoothed it over, but they did."

Dula was also on the stand last week. Mr. McReynolds read into the record several letters which had passed between Dula and the other agents relating to the development of the business of the trust, particularly of the plug-tobacco trade. One of these related how they had one independent competitor "between the devil and the deep blue sea," as a result of price cutting, and another told how they were giving sone one "a pretty hard rub."

One letter told of the efforts to buy out a competitor, and read: "We gave him some pretty hot shot and a dose of ipecac and made him so sick that I guess he will be ready to sell. There is no use in having a chicken with three legs when the third leg is in the way."

Mr. McReynolds read a letter from John Middleton, a southern representative, to Mr. Dula, dated March 14, 1906. Mr. Middleton wrote: "What do you think of the recent Supreme Court decision? I would like to have your views. Just draw on your imagination, and I think you will find some people sitting on a tack, points up, heads down."

"Who was sitting on the tack?" asked Mr. McReynolds.

"I don't know. You can infer as well as I can," retorted Mr. Dula.

Another letter indicating an effort upon the part of the American Tobacco Company to get control of the Globe Tobacco Company, of Detroit, was also introduced in evidence. A confidential agent was to offer $200 a share for the stock of the Globe Company, but he failed to get the company.

Among the letters in which Special Attorney-General McReynolds showed particular interest was one referring to the position of the R. A. Patterson Tobacco Company, of Richmond, in the Independent Tobacco Manufacturers' Association, written by Dula, in which the writer gave it as his opinion that President Landstreet of the Patterson company should resign from the association. The reason given for the advice was what the writer termed the "unbusinesslike" thing requiring every member to make an affidavit to the effect that he had no connection with the tobacco trust. Dula testified that the Patterson Company was controlled by the tobacco trust.

"How many companies connected with the American Tobacco Company were members of the association?" asked Mr. McReynolds.

"I don't know," replied the witness, "but I presume those who are members held their membership before the American Tobacco Company was organized."

The attention of the witness was called to letters he had sent to Alexander Hamilton at Petersburg, Va., inclosing checks, $1,067 one month, $951 another. He said that Hamilton was the representative of the Bland Tobacco Company. He was not in the employ of the tobacco trust, and witness said he was not certain for what purpose the money was paid.

"Was not that money paid as a subsidy to the Bland Company?" asked Mr. McReynolds.

"I presume so," replied Mr. Dula.

HOW THE TRUST DRIVES OUT COMPETITORS—A PRACTICAL ILLUSTRATION OF ITS METHODS PLACED BEFORE SPECIAL ATTORNEY-GENERAL M'REYNOLDS.

[Special to Tobacco.]

NEWARK, N. J., December 10, 1907.

The following letter was forwarded this week to Special Attorney-General McReynolds, in charge of the prosecution of the tobacco trust, by the H. A. Rosner Cigar Company, of Newark:

Special Attorney-General McReynolds, New York.

JUDGE MCREYNOLDS:

We wish to draw your attention to an incident such as is being brought out by your investigation.

About a month ago a Mr. Davis, representative of the United Cigar Stores Company, offered I. Boyland, No. 251 Main street, Orange, N. J., $1,000 for his cigar store, situated at the above address. Prior to this the United Cigar Stores Company tried to lease a store in the immediate neighborhood, but were unsuccessful. After the refusal of Mr. Boyland to dispose of his store, Mr. George Whelan, president of the United Cigar Stores Company, began negotiations with the landlord of Boyland's store—a Mr. Reynolds, of Munn avenue, East Orange, N. J.—for the lease of the store adjoining the store now occupied as a cigar store by said Boyland, in the same building, and owned by the same landlord. The lease of the store had just expired. The United Cigar Stores Company offered $1,800 for the store, and the landlord accepted. The present tenants are paying $1,200 per year. If you care to use this case as an illustration of the trust's efforts to put a man, who has been in business for ten years, out of business, Mr. Boyland will be pleased to testify at any time that you may select.

Very truly, yours,

H. A. ROSNER CIGAR COMPANY.

TOBACCO TRUST'S DIRTY WORK—MORE VICIOUS METHODS DETAILED BY ITS OWN OFFICERS—SPIES VISIT INDEPENDENT STORES—PLOT TO CORNER SCRAP TOBACCO.

The Government suit against the tobacco trust is becoming more and more significant as the sessions continue and Special Attorney-General J. C. McReynolds and his assistant, William P. Grosvenor, get the opportunity to build up their framework of testimony.

The record Tuesday was filled with many a telling point which must go far in establishing proof of the Government's contention.

The first witness called Tuesday was Thomas Smith, a buyer for the American Snuff Company. He testified to the methods and negotiations entered into whereby the trust acquired its raw material. He was followed by A. B. Christian, secretary of the American Snuff Company. Mr. Christian was cross-examined with great thoroughness concerning the ramifications of his concern. He was forced to disclose the fact that Percival S. Hill, James B. Duke, and C. C. Dula were stockholders of the American Snuff Company and on the directorate, as they are in the American Tobacco Company. Mr. Christian tried to create the impression, however, that Duke, Hill, and Dula exercised no control over the Snuff Company, asserting that they seldom attended the meetings.

Judge McReynolds examined the witness at great length regarding the various organizations of the different snuff companies now controlled by the tobacco trust; he showed that there was, after all the denials of the trust witnesses, a general management over all, and that the American Snuff Company was supplying all the under snuff companies of the trust.

Perhaps the most important witness on the stand Friday was G. B. Hutchins, chief buyer of scrap tobacco for the tobacco trust, whose office is at 111 Fifth avenue, and who receives his mail in the same mail box of the general post-office as his associates. Hutchins admitted outright on the stand that the ring higher up, Duke and his associates, had juggled through deals whereby they had acquired the Penn Tobacco Company, the Queen City, the Day and Night, and all the rest of the tobacco companies that were acquired secretly without his knowledge. Although he was at the head of the scrap tobacco department and had deals with these companies, Mr. Hutchins claimed that he knew nothing about what was going on until the equity bill was filed in the Government suit.

The scrap tobacco corner, which was manipulated by the tobacco trust in January, 1906, was shown up in masterly fashion by Judge McReynolds. The tobacco trust had put the fake Queen City firm in the field, and with its other subsidiary companies which it secretly owned began to acquire the scrap tobacco and juggle the market price until it was far above 20 cents a pound. The trust had a big supply, but Friedlander, of the old Day and Night Company, which was at that time independent, did not, and the price was inflated so that it was more than the finished tobacco product made from the scraps would sell for.

The proceedings Monday were opened by Special Attorney-General McReynolds recalling Percival S. Hill to the stand, making the fourth recall of that witness.

Correspondence dictated and signed by Hill disclosed the fact that he sent spies around to various independent stands and stores to ascertain what particular brands of cigars and cigarettes were being featured by the independents. A spy would enter a retailer's establishment and ask for a good 10-cent cigar. At the Hoffman House, one of the places visited, the clerk behind the counter put forward a Robert Burns cigar. In another instance the tobacco trust spy asked for a good little cigar for 15 cents, and the clerk brought forward Robert Burns Petite Ducs. After ascertaining that the independent brands were being pushed, Hill would write to the various tobacco trust salesmen and sharply ask them why it was that independent goods were being featured in such a manner.

Hill's letters to salesmen all stipulated that the letter be kept absolutely secret. He would apprise his salesmen where certain brands of little cigars were selling heavily and direct the tobacco trust salesmen to adopt measures to stop it.

Hill was also asked by Counselor Parker, of the tobacco trust, about the exact amount of money advanced by the trust to the United Cigar Stores Company, both in advertising allowances and otherwise. Hill went into a gruesome story of how other manufacturers wanted to get the United Stores to use their goods in window displays and tried to justify the enormous subsidies of the trust to the United company in that manner.

"What means did you adopt for acquiring this information about how these brands of little cigars were sold?" asked Judge McReynolds.

"I don't recall," said Hill, and everybody cast ominous glances in the direction of the witness. Hill was also asked to identify certain correspondence which he wrote to the effect that the tobacco trust had better push its proposed contracts and agreements in Australia and acquire a practical monopoly in that country.

A remarkable instance of Mr. Hill's high-handedness was a letter addressed to Thomas J. Luce, president of the Acker, Merrall & Condit Company, in which Hill deprecates the fact that Luce had purchased a small lot of cigarettes from an independent manufacturer. Hill denounced the cigarettes as trash and inquired of Luce by what right he had to handle independent goods anyway.

Upon cross-examination by Counsellor Parker, Hill made a lame attempt to justify his secret methods of finding out the extent and destination of the goods of independent manufacturers by saying that he wanted to stimulate the efforts of his own salesmen.

After Hill had been excused C. C. Dula was recalled to identify certain correspondence which appertained to plug tobacco and which dovetailed into his other testimony.

With the exception of Hill, the most damaging admissions were drawn from John Conley, of the Conley Tin Foil Company, a new witness. Mr. Conley proved to be most effeminate in his manner and seemed so willing to disclose everything that he knew, so that the proof on the records is about as complete as a thorough lawyer like McReynolds, assisted by a good witness, could make it.

Conley began his testimony by stating that the original firm name of his concern was Thomas Conley & Sons, and that it did business for the tobacco trust. His firm got into financial difficulties, he said, and really didn't know what to do; when, lo and behold, a monster tin foil trust appeared and threatened to absorb the Conley outfit; whereupon the Conley family, to save itself, turned from the tin foil trust and jumped into the outstretched arms of the tobacco trust.

Conley, in answer to questions put by Judge McReynolds, admitted that he furnished tin foil to a great list of concerns now controlled by the tobacco trust. He estimated the total output of his concern for the past three years, which showed that the volume of business increased each year since the tobacco trust was being catered to. He admitted that he sold to the trust at a certain percentage above actual cost of production to insure a small dividend. When pressed by Judge McReynolds, he admitted that after the tobacco trust was provided with tin foil the Conley firm frequently sold to independents below cost, thus disclosing the fact that the Conley Company was trying to kill off its independent competitors in the manufacture of tin foil.

Mr. Conley also described in detail the negotiations which resulted in the tobacco trust acquiring this concern. He admitted that the trust advanced money to the Conley Company frequently and virtually admitted that the trust absolutely controlled the Conley Company.

Thursday J. B. Cobb, president of the American Cigar Company and vice-president of the American Tobacco Company, was called to the stand by Judge McReynolds.

Cobb endeavored to show that the formation of the tobacco trust and its subsidiaries had been beneficial to the trade, but the task proved too much for him. Cobb said in support of his position that seventeeen years of advertising had increased the demand for Burley leaf tobacco so that 150,000 acres are under cultivation to-day on the same land where cotton was formerly grown, as the tobacco was considered more profitable than cotton and had a more certain market, since the tobacco trust was constantly in the market with ready cash.

George J. Whelan, president of the United Cigar Stores Company, was the principal witness Friday. Mr. Whelan unbosomed himself at great length and recited the vicissitudes of the United Cigar Stores Company from its inception.

Whelan admitted the well-known fact that the tobacco trust owns 51 per cent of the stock of the United Company, and said that the latter company in 1906 paid 40 per cent dividend on its common stock. Whelan further testified that the United Company at the present time had 405 stores. He claimed that the tobacco trust officers did not have a voice in the management of the United Company, and really tried to look truthful while he said it. Whelan also testified that when he started the chain of stores he could not interest the trust, but he capitalized for $2,000,000 so that people would think that the trust was behind it. Whelan said that later he got the trust interested, and that 12 per cent had been paid on the common stock in 1904, 20 per cent in 1905, and 40 per cent in 1906.

CONGRESSMAN TAWNEY TO LEAD—GREAT FIGHT AGAINST GIFT COUPONS PLANNED AT RECENT CONFERENCE—STRONG SUPPORT HAS ALREADY BEEN ENLISTED.

[Special to Tobacco.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 16, 1907.

Representative TAWNEY, who has twice led a splendid fight in the interests of the independent cigar and tobacco interests of the United States for the enactment of legislation which should sound the death knell of the pernicious and iniquitous gift-coupon system, is ready once more put forth his best efforts in the same good cause.

Tobacco is in a position to make the exclusive but authoritative announcement that an anticoupon bill will be introduced in Congress by Representative TAWNEY early in January, and that he will fight for its enactment with all the resources at his command.

A conference of several Members of Congress interested in the passage of such a measure, because they feel that it is earnestly desired by a large number of their constituents as well as by practically every member of the independent cigar and tobacco trade, was held recently, when a surprisingly large amount of support was pledged toward whatever anticoupon bill might be determined upon as best meeting the needs of the trade.

It was found that many powerful interests were in favor of an anticoupon law and that a number of prominent Congressmen were not only ready and willing but anxious to lend the weight of their voices and influence in favor of an anticoupon bill when introduced.

In view of the splendid fights which Congressman TAWNEY had led against the gift-coupon sharks in the past, it was unanimously agreed that he was the one of all others to introduce the proposed bill at the present session.

Congressman TAWNEY said that he would gladly do this and that his only anxiety was to introduce such a bill as should best meet the views of the independent members of the cigar and tobacco trade. If it was thought that the former Tawney bill, with certain slight changes that experience had suggested as desirable, would best meet the requirements, well and good; but if, on the other hand, a new bill should be deemed necessary, he would cheerfully lay the old bill aside and introduce an entirely different draft.

It seemed to be the consensus of opinion of those present at the conference, however, that it would indeed be a most difficult matter to devise a bill as certain to kill the gift coupon in connection with the manufacture and sale of cigars, cigarettes, manufactured tobacco, and snuff as the Tawney bill, and in all probability that bill with certain minor changes, which strengthen rather than weaken it, will be introduced in Congress during the first week in January.

One of the strongest arguments advanced in favor of the Tawney bill was that when it was before an earlier session of Congress it met with the bitterest, most intense, and most strenuous opposition from the tobacco trust.

The tobacco trust at that time not only maintained a powerful lobby at Washington, but it poured out money like water to encompass the defeat of the Tawney bill. Something like a score of the powerful subsidiary companies of the tobacco trust which were at that time falsely masquerading as independent concerns were ordered to hurry their representatives to Washington and to engage expensive legal counsel to aid in the fight.

Indeed, the strongest and most effective argument that was advanced against the Tawney bill at that time was the statement that not all of the independent manufacturers and jobbers were agreed in favor of the measure, and the names of a number of at that time supposedly independent concerns were quoted as opposed to the bill.

The evidence drawn out at the trial of the tobacco trust now in progress has developed the fact that not only were all of those supposedly independent concerns secretly owned or controlled by the trust, but that orders for them to fight the Tawney bill were actually sent out from the inner circle at 111 Fifth avenue, New York.

It was pointed out at the recent conference that before the tobacco trust put up this tremendous fight against the Tawney bill it had obtained copies of the measure and had them minutely scrutinized and carefully studied not only by its own legal department, but by many of the ablest and highest-priced lawyers in the land, and that had they been able to discover any hope that it could have been set aside as unconstitutional, or its provisions legally evaded, the trust would not have expended an enormous sum and bent its every energy to bring about its defeat.

The fact that the tobacco trust so bitterly opposed the Tawney bill before was urged as the strongest of all reasons why it should be revived and passed, as it seems now practically assured that it will be at the present session of Congress.

REGULUS II.

TOBACCO TRUST MAKES ANSWER—PLEADS THAT ITS BRITISH-AMERICAN BRANCH IS AN ENGLISH CORPORATION.

[Special to Tobacco.]

NORFOLK, December 16, 1907.

The British-American Tobacco Company, branch of the tobacco trust, claiming ownership of the 8,750,000 cigarettes valued at $7,272.50, which were seized by the Government in October while in transit here for export to England and Singapore, to-day filed its answer to the information filed by the Government for the forfeiture of the cigarettes because of alleged combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman antitrust laws.

The respondent asserts that if it is possible for the law under which the Government is proceeding in this case to be construed as authorizing the seizure of said cigarettes in advance of a judicial determination that this respondent is violating said law, the said act would be unconstitutional because confiscatory and entailing unreasonable loss to this respondent, whose business would be annihilated by the repeated seizures before a legal test of the law could be made.

The British-American branch of the trust admits that for business convenience it maintains an office in New York, but says it is a British corporation and that all its contracts were entered into on British soil and are not subject to American statutes.

WELLS-WHITEHEAD COMPANY MAY BE WOUND UP—TOBACCO TRUST IS SAID TO BE CONSIDERING SHUTTING DOWN OF CIGARETTE PLANT AT WILSON, N. C.

[Special to Tobacco.]

WILSON, N. C., December 16, 1907.

Although the utmost secrecy is being maintained as to the future plans of the tobacco trust in connection with its Wells-Whitehead branch in Wilson, there are whispers in the matter of discontinuing the local cigarette factory and winding up the corporate existence of the company.

It is well known that the cigarette output of the Wells-Whitehead Company has been steadily and rapidly diminishing during the past two or three years, and it is further pointed out that the trust has recently ceased its efforts to push the brands of cigarettes made in the Wells-Whitehead factory in many localities where they fromerly obtained a considerable sale, and is seemingly striving to replace the product of the Wilson branch with a brand of cigarettes made in one of the trust factories in Richmond, Va.

The Wells-Whitehead Company was originally organized as an independent concern and employed only union labor. It was later secretly purchased by the tobacco trust, although it continued for some time thereafter to masquerade as an independent concern. When it became generally known that it was a branch of the tobacco trust the sale of its cigarettes began to diminish in certain sections where there is a strong antitrust feeling, and the sales still further diminished when the Wilson factory was deprived of the union label because of its affiliation with the tobacco trust.

The recent testimony of P. S. Hill at the tobacco trust trial in New York that some 10,000,000 badly damaged cigarettes were sent out from this factory in one year, making a big hole in the profits, is also taken as an indication that the trust has found the Wells-Whitehead anything but the revenue producer which it was expected to be when it was secretly acquired.

SUIT AGAINST TOBACCO TRUST—ACTION BEGUN BY PUBLIC PROSECUTOR IN MASON COUNTY, KY., WHICH WILL BE FOLLOWED WITH INTEREST.

[Special to Tobacco.]

MAYSVILLE, KY., December 16, 1907.

Suit was recently filed in the Mason circuit court by Commonwealth's Attorney Mathew J. Hennessey against the tobacco trust, which is being followed with eager interest in all sections of Kentucky where the trust does business. The petition in part is as follows:

"Commonwealth of Kentucky, plaintiff, against American Tobacco Company, defendant. The plaintiff states that the defendant is a corporation created under and by the laws of one of the States of the United States, the name of the particular one being unknown to plaintiffs, with power to contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued by its corporate name; that it did, in the county of Mason and State of Kentucky, within the last twelve months and before the institution of this action, unlawfully create, establish, organize, enter into, and become a member of a party to and interested in a pool, trust, combine, agreement, confederation, and understanding with, and with other corporations, partnerships, persons, individuals, and associations of persons to the plaintiff unknown, which combination was so created, established, organized, and entered into for the purpose of regulating, controlling, and fixing the price of merchandise, manufactured articles and property, to wit: Tobacco, both in the leaf and manufacturing, and in pursuance of said pool, trust, combination, and agreement, did unlawfully control, regulate, and fix the price of said tobacco in said county during said time, to plaintiff's damage, in the sum of $5,000, whereof plaintiff prays judgment against defendant for above sums."

BOURBON.

TOBACCO TRUST OFFICIALS AND PERJURY.

Perjury: The willful giving under oath lawfully administered in a judicial proceeding of false testimony in regard to a matter or thing material to the issue or point of inquiry. (Definition from the Standard Dictionary.)

A person who swears or affirms that he will truly testify, declare, depose, or certify, or that in any declaration, deposition, certificate, affidavit, or other writing, by him subscribed as true in an action or special proceeding, or upon any hearing or inquiry, or on any occasion in which an oath is required by law, or is necessary for the prosecution or defense of a private right, or for the ends of public justice, in such action or proceeding, or on such hearing, inquiry, or other occasion, and willfully and knowingly testifies, declares, deposes, or certifies falsely in any material matter, or states in his testimony, declaration, deposition, affidavit, or certificate which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury. (Digest from Chapter V, section 96, of the New York Penal Code.)

The crime of perjury is further defined in the statutes of the United States, under which the case of the tobacco trust is now on trial, and the punishment explicitly prescribed for that crime is a long term of years in prison.

It must be apparent to every intelligent member of the trade that practically every officer of the tobacco trust who has thus far taken the witness stand in the case against the tobacco trust now on trial before the United States district court has laid himself liable to prosecution for the crime of perjury.

In more than one instance the witnesses have deliberately walked into the traps set for them by Special Attorney-General McReynolds, and testified with great positiveness to certain things, only to be contradicted with equal positiveness by the introduction of letters written by them and bearing their own signatures.

Thus, for example, Vice-President Hill testified that the ownership of the United Cigar Stores by the tobacco trust had never been denied or concealed, only to be immediately confronted with a letter bearing his own signature, urging a well-known Boston firm, whose relations were known to be particularly intimate with the tobacco trust, to deny all reports that the trust was behind the United Stores.

Then again Hill testified positively that the tobacco trust did not pay one cent toward the rent of the store in the Flatiron Building, and never had. Now, while the Government prosecutor did not have letters to refute this statement on the part of Hill, its falsity could have been established without difficulty as the real-estate broker who negotiated the lease of the premises in the Flatiron Building to the tobacco trust, long before the building was completed, published the fact broadcast that the tobacco trust was the lessee.

Furthermore the tobacco trust made overtures to Robert E. Lane, the well-known independent cigar dealer, to take the Flatiron store under an arrangement by which the trust offered to meet a considerable part of the rent on condition that Mr. Lane would push trust goods.

Tobacco knows that much pressure was brought to bear upon Mr. Lane by different trust officials to induce him to accept the proposition, and that it was not until after he had irrevocably turned it down that it was finally decided to open the place as a United Store.

Moreover, the testimony of the tobacco-trust witnesses is not only contradicted by their own letters, but the witnesses themselves contradict each other. Thus Vice-President Hill laid great stress upon the assertion that the tobacco trust had never sought to conceal its connection with any of its branch concerns, while Vice-President Dula testified with a wealth of interesting detail that the trust had repeatedly caused companies which it owned and controlled to masquerade as independents and to offer their products to the trade and to the public as independent products, "not made by the trust."

Both Hill and Dula denied on the witness stand that they had sought by devious and underhanded ways to obtain information as to the output of independent competitors, only to later admit various specific instances in which they sought for and received information of that character.

Vice-President Dula testified in set terms that there had never been any attempt on the part of the tobacco trust to boycott or slander the output of independent manufacturers, nor was there ever any hindrance to the free distribution of independent products put in their way by the trust. This most amazing testimony was flatly contradicted, not only by numerous letters, but by damaging admissions from the lips of both Dula and Hill.

To the mind of the ordinary layman, therefore, it must appear quite possible that if all other methods of punishing the tobacco trust fail, a number of the prominent officers of the trust might be indicted and probably ultimately sent to the penitentiary for long terms for violation of the statutes against perjury.

THE MASK IS OFF AT LAST.

By distorting the evidence at the tobacco trust trial, with an evident purpose to discredit one of the stanchest independent houses in the trade, and then refusing to repair the wrong, one of Tobacco's would-be contemporaries has shown that—while it might be base flattery to call it a wolf in sheep's clothing—it has masqueraded as a pretended friend of the independents, apparently that it might stab one of them in the back at the first opportunity.

Tobacco is glad to see the mask laid aside. Independent interests have less to fear from an open enemy doing scavenger work for the trust than from a pretended friend who would entice them to destruction in the gift-coupon quagmire.

TRUTHS ABOUT TOBACCO TRUST—COURAGEOUS EDITORIAL UTTERANCES OF A GREAT, CONSERVATIVE DAILY NEWSPAPER IN KENTUCKY—MASTERLY ARRAIGNMENT OF VICIOUS METHODS.

[Special to Tobacco.]

LEXINGTON, KY., December 16, 1907.

The Lexington Herald, one of the most substantial and conservatively edited daily newspapers in Kentucky, has the courage to handle the iniquitous tobacco trust without gloves. It speaks with authority and voices the sentiments of the best elements in the great burley tobacco-growing district in which it circulates.

The Herald has at all times deprecated opposition to the laws of the Commonwealth, and been a stanch supporter of constituted authority, but at the same time it is not blind to the fact that the underlying cause of the present turbulent conditions in various sections is the vicious methods of the tobacco trust and its vassals.

In a recent issue of the Herald was printed a powerful editorial based upon a study of the tobacco trust in the current issue of a great popular magazine. This editorial shows a keen insight into the methods of the tobacco trust, coupled with a courage which is all too rare in a vast majority of the daily newspapers of the United States. The editorial in the Herald was, in part, as follows:

"The ordinary mind is staggered by the amount of securities issued in the various steps which have led to the formation of the tobacco trust, on which the people of America pay dividends. Mr. Russell writes as if he were both careful and accurate, and so far we know no reason to doubt his statements or discredit his conclusions.

"The effect of the formation of the tobacco trust is that the people of America, the consumers and producers of tobacco, are paying each year millions of dollars upon stock which represents nothing except the capitalization of the violation of the law, which resulted in the formation of this trust and the injection of oceans of water into its securities.

"We can not attempt to give even a summary of Mr. Russell's account. But we recommend it to the consideration of every reader of the Herald and particularly to those who believe that the recent Republican Administrations have enforced the laws against such combinations.

"According to Mr. Russell's article the total capitalization of the American tobacco trust, including the various subsidiary and dummy companies, is about $500,000,000, a growth in less than eighteen years from assets worth less than $20,000,000.

"On this huge amount of stock the people have been and are paying dividends which the trust is enabled to squeeze out by its control of the purchase of the raw product and the sale of the finished product.

"As is well known to the readers of the Herald, we have urged the burley tobacco growers to observe the law. We have stated, what is the fact, that this section of the State must not be disgraced by lawless outbreaks such as have disgraced the southwestern section.

"We have incurred the resentment of some of those most heavily interested in the growing of burley tobacco by emphasizing the necessity for the observance of the law and pointing out as clearly as we are able that, no matter what happens, the growers and producers of tobacco will harm only themselves by any attempts to use force or coercion in this section of the State. And we repeat with all emphasis everything we have said along these lines.

"And yet when one reads the account of the formation and conduct of the American tobacco trust and realizes how it has been organized and is being conducted in violation of the fundamental principles of law and equity and morals; when one realizes how, through its efforts to control the cigar stores, individuals have been ruined by its unfair competition, and through its power to control the prices of tobacco whole communities have been thrown into a state of lawlessness and hundreds of families put into what is practical want, it brings a realization of the failure of our National and State governments to enforce the law against such organizations as this.

"From the members of 'the peaceful armies of invasion' who first warn in a courteous, but not pleasant, manner those who do not agree with their views in regard to the sale of tobacco, to 'the night riders,' who, under the cover of darkness, apply a torch to the barn of their neighbors or commit assassination, the producer who violates the law is amenable to the ordinary criminal processes, and for the salvation of the civilization of the tobacco districts must be made to respect those statutes and be punished when they are violated. But for the past fifteen years such men as organized the tobacco trust, and through it have wrung from the American people millions of dollars by the evasion or violation of the law, have been immune from punishment, and the attempt of the individual growers to better their condition by violence affects in no way the profits of these men.

"In our judgment the remedy can come only by national laws enforced by national officers. The tobacco trust must either be dissolved or regulated by national laws which are enforced, and that party which stands for the enforcement of such laws must be put in power."

There can be no question, but if there were more daily newspapers with the conservatism and courage manifested in these utterances of the Lexington Herald, the day would speedily come when the tobacco trust would be shorn of its power to wreak harm upon the people of all classes and in all sections of the United States.

JUSTICE.

[Editorial in New York Journal of Commerce.]

SAMPLE TRUST METHODS.

In the taking of testimony before the United States commissioner in the suit against the tobacco trust some choice examples of the methods used in forming that combination are brought out. The honorable character of the proceedings is illustrated by the secrecy observed in gathering in some of the constituent concerns. One of the vice-presidents of the American Tobacco Company has told how he arranged the organization of a company in Cincinnati which was to be ostensibly independent. The American and Continental companies furnished the money and were the real owners, but a Boston financier was put forward as the backer and correspondence reveals the highly honorable means adopted to insure secrecy. The "independent" manager advised that correspondence be conducted under assumed names, and in one of his letters he told how he had assured a suspicious labor union that "we have absolutely no connection" with the trust, adding "we will have to be very careful or the connection will be exposed."

A company at Louisville was secretly acquired by buying up the stock, and as soon as full control was secured the plant was dismantled and the business abandoned at that point. Other correspondence shows how a company was formed in New Orleans for the purpose of running out an established concern there and occupying the field. The man employed to organize the new company wrote that he would make it a business success and run the People's Tobacco Company out of business. "I will not only get their business," he wrote, "but I expect to cause a strike in the People's Company factory." Such were the noble tactics pursued in building up a beneficient monopoly in the tobacco business. These are only sample illustrations of the methods used.

CASE AGAINST TRUST RESUMED—HOW THE LIGGETT & MYERS COMPANY WAS ACQUIRED—TRUST'S CAMELS CAPTURED BY BRIGANDS—FINES OF SPIES WERE PAID WITHOUT QUESTION.

The suit of the United States Government against the tobacco trust was resumed Monday and the work of adding to the already long record went merrily on.

The last witness Tuesday was Watson B. Dickerman, of the New York brokerage firm of Moore & Schley, who testified that he was a stockholder of the American Tobacco Company, owning $300,000 worth of stock. He also stated in response to the questions put by Special Attorney-General McReynolds that the firm of Moore & Schley probably owned a small amount in its own right, but that most of the tobacco-trust stock that Moore & Schley carried was for customers.

Judge McReynolds then questioned Mr. Dickerman regarding the purchase of the Liggett & Myers Company, in 1899, and asked if that was not the largest manufacturer of plug tobacco at that time. Mr. Dickerman stated that he bought the Liggett & Myers Company, but he was uncertain as to whether it was the largest or not. Mr. Dickerman stated that he paid $12,500,000 for the Liggett & Myers Company, and that he bought it for the Continental Tobacco Company, which was the leading tobacco-trust organization at that time. Mr. Dickerman said that he sold the great plug-tobacco concern to the Continental Tobacco Company for 175,000 shares of Continental Tobacco Company stock, common, and for 175,000 shares of stock in the same company, preferred, together with $5,000,000 in cash, which in all totaled up to a valuation of $17,500,000. The tobacco-trust counsel tried to show that the Continental Tobacco Company stock at the time of the purchase of the Liggett & Myers Company was below par value of $100 a share and suffered many fluctuations, consequently the price could not be deemed to be excessive.

Judge McReynolds inquired from the witness whether he purchased the assets or the capital of the stock. "I purchased the whole property," Mr. Dickerman replied.

"Who furnished the money in the purchase?" asked Judge McReynolds.

"The money was furnished by different people," replied the witness.

"Who were they?" asked the Government prosecutor.

"O. H. Bain, James B. Duke, Thomas F. Ryan, Peter A. B. Widener, and Herbert L. Terrill."

"From whom was the capital stock bought?" asked Judge McReynolds.

"It was bought from different parties. Part of the stock was bought from George P. Butler. I obtained an option on the stock which he had; with respect to the rest of the stock, I made a contract to purchase it; it was held by the Myers people and was turned over to me in two separate lots."

The witness stated that though the stock which he secured by the purchase totaled up to $35,000,000 in valuation, nevertheless it was not worth that amount of money. That, he claimed, was the nominal value and not the actual value.

The counsel for the tobacco trust tried to show that the stock was of a depreciating value, and also to show that Mr. Dickerman made the offer to the tobacco trust clique before a meeting of the board of directors at which neither Duke, Ryan, and Widener were present.

Earlier in the day, Tuesday, Karl Jungbluth, president of the McAndrews & Forbes Company branch of the tobacco trust, was recalled to complete the thread of evidence in the licorice transactions of the trust.

Jungbluth was cross-examined at great length and no detail was lost sight of in welding the chain of evidence as to the monopoly of licorice. The first thing Tuesday morning Jungbluth was asked where his office was. He replied, like all the rest, 111 Fifth avenue. He admitted it was elsewhere up to a year or so ago, but now he was directly under the sheltering wing of Duke and his disciples.

"Your company has the same law department as the American Tobacco Company, has it not?" asked General McReynolds. The witness said "Yes." The Government counsel asked Jungbluth several questions to ascertain whether he knew just what was going on in the tobacco companies at 111 Fifth avenue, but it appeared that he did not, because he stated that he did not know that the Pinkerton Tobacco Company, of Zanesville, Ohio, was part and parcel of the tobacco trust until the Government bill in the present suit was filed. The witness appeared equally ignorant about numerous other secret deals which he was asked about.

Jungbluth was questioned at great length about the licorice business, what percentage of the world's product of licorice was used in tobacco, what percentage the McAndrews & Forbes Company furnished, how much of the total output of the McAndrews & Forbes Company was furnished by the tobacco trust. To the latter query, 82 per cent was the answer, and Jungbluth could only estimate roughly about the world's product. Jungbluth admitted that the amount of licorice paste furnished to the tobacco trust was only 50 or 60 per cent before the last McAndrews & Forbes incorporation and capitalization.

He stated that the price of licorice was 7½ cents a pound and then several years ago it was raised to 8 cents. He went on further to say that the risks and perils incident to procuring the licorice root in the Orient forced the McAndrews & Forbes Company to raise the price to independent manufacturers to 9 cents a pound, except those who had long-term agreements, and the latter were to get theirs for 8 cents.

Jungbluth spun a tale that sounded like Baron Munchausen when he stated that bandits stole fifty camels belonging to the trust in the Orient; that the Turks exacted heavy tributes in the shape of tithes upon the profits, and that even now they were negotiating, at 111 Fifth avenue, with certain potentates who had to have a share in the graft. There were other disturbances in Asia Minor, Syria, and Turkish Arabia. Even the Russian-Japanese war nearly put the McAndrews & Forbes Company on its uppers. When the bandits stole the camels, the camels had licorice root on their backs and the bandits demanded certain ransom, which was paid, or they were going to saunter off with the camels and the licorice. But Jungbluth said that the tobacco trust got after Turkey and that it paid an indemnity; but, it seems, he was not sure of being able to get the indemnity every time, and consequently he planned to have the independent tobacco manufacturers to pay it in the shape of increased prices for licorice paste.

Jungbluth said that his branch of the trust had no agreement with the John D. Lewis factory in Providence since 1905, and that he did not at present know what Lewis was doing. He was forced to admit that the American Tobacco Company was the real financial backer of the McAndrews & Forbes Company, and that it often advanced the licorice company a million and a million and a half dollars, swelling its capital up to a total of five or six million dollars. The witness explained that the chief reason why contracts were given out, when asked by tobacco-trust counsel, was to avoid competition in acquiring the licorice root on the other side of the ocean. He admitted when he went on the stand Monday that the McAndrews & Forbes Company own a number of factories, and that it owned and controlled the J. S. Young Company, of Baltimore, Md., though that concern had a separate factory management.

He admitted that one of the factories abroad had been closed down temporarily for lack of business and that it may be closed down permanently. He stated that the McAndrews concern controlled factories in Newark, N. J.; Hampton, N. J., and Baltimore. Jungbluth was required to give statistics concerning every phase of the licorice business and he brought his own records and showed an apparent willingness to tell everything that he knew.

He was required to disclose the business arrangements of his company with the Weaver & Sterry (Limited) Corporation, of New York; John D. Lewis, of Providence; the Stamford Manufacturing Company, and the Greaves Pharmaceutical Company. Jungbluth admitted that Weaver & Sterry imported certain grades of Spanish root for his company. Jungbluth was questioned concerning the deal with the Mellor & Rittenhouse Company, and stated that the company was bought by stock.

Jungbluth was questioned concerning his prosecution by the United States Government under the Sherman law last December and January and concerning the indictment found some months before by the grand jury.

He went into great detail as regards the entire financial transactions of the McAndrews & Forbes Company, disclosed its financial condition, how much money was paid out from time to time, and was required to introduce all manner of figures concerning every phase of the licorice industry.

He testified that he had been in the licorice business since 1872; that at the outset he was the general agent for the old McAndrews & Forbes Company, in Louisville, Ky., from 1874 to 1902, and that in 1902, when the present company was organized, he became its president. He was forced to admit that the American Tobacco Company owned $785,000 of the capital stock and about 70 per cent of the common stock; that the indebtedness of the McAndrews & Forbes Company varies from $400,000 to $1,500,000, and that contracts existed between it and the American Company and other tobacco trust concerns which would extend to the year 1915. He admitted that the J. S. Young Company advertised itself as independent and without tobacco trust affiliations in the trade papers, and seemed to try to create the impression that he made frantic efforts to stop it, but couldn't because Duke or somebody else wouldn't let him.

Jungbluth admitted that everything had been under the express personal direction of James B. Duke and the late Charles S. Hallwell, and that the advice of the tobacco trust officials was followed in every instance.

John Conley, jr., of the Conley Foil Company, was again recalled Monday. He was forced to recite in detail how the price of pig tin had fluctuated. He admitted that pig tin was 15 cents per pound higher than in 1900, and lead 7½ cents higher. He was forced to admit that the Lehmaier-Schwarz Company, the independent concern, had suffered a decrease in business since the Conley Company had acquired the right to do the business for the tobacco trust. He was questioned concerning the conviction of his superintendent, James Flood, who was convicted under the antitipping law for conspiring to obtain the trade secrets of the Lehmaier-Schwarz Company by means of spies who went into the Lehmaier-Schwarz factory. He admitted that James Flood was still in his employ and stated that he had paid the fine of Flood and also of Pergoli, his confederate, out of his own pocket, and also all disbursements in the conspiracy. He stated that he did not know it was going on, however, and that he was disgusted with the whole business.

He was questioned concerning the acquirement of the Hudson Tin Foil Company and admitted that he had conducted the correspondence, and admitted also that the Conley concern held a majority of the stock in that firm. He stated that the profits accruing to the Conley company on the manufacture of tin foil was about 10 per cent.

He recited the dividends of past years, as follows: 1904, 29 per cent, 9 per cent cash and 20 script; 1905, 26 per cent in cash; 1906, 15 per cent in cash; 1907, 15 per cent in cash.

He admitted that the purchase of the Hudson Tin Foil Company by the Conley Company was concealed from the public, but tried to justify that procedure by asserting that he was afraid of sympathetic strikes.

A TOBACCO-TRUST TRICK IN CHICAGO—BELIEVED TO HAVE INSTIGATED WHOLESALE ARRESTS OF INDEPENDENT CIGAR DEALERS.

CHICAGO, January 6, 1908.

The last day of the old year was celebrated by the beginning of a crusade against penny-in-the-slot machines which throw up poker hands or colored disks, certain combinations of which entitle the holders to cigars. H. H. Van Meter, said to be a writer, represented by L. C. Whitman, an attorney, is said to be behind the crusade. Practically everyone in the loop district having a slot machine which could be construed as a game of chance was included in the complaints filed, and the result was that many prominent people who had not given much thought to the matter one way or another were cited and had to appear in the municipal court, personally or by counsel, and sign their recognizance. It is not known that Mr. Van Meter is a purist or reformer, and many are inclined to lay the blame of the wholesale prosecutions upon the tobacco trust, whose United Cigar Stores have been doing less and less business of late. As the tobacco trust's stores in Chicago have no slot machines, those independents who have been using such machines may have been thought by the United managers to have thereby had an advantage. This is the most reasonable theory advanced to account for the prosecutions.

The cases were called last Saturday morning at the Harrison street branch of the municipal court, but the prosecution was not ready for trial and the cases were continued until the last of January. It was stated that Van Meter was in Michigan.

Judge Newcomer, before whom the cases came up, seemed inclined to dismiss all the charges, as he doubted the genuineness of the motive behind the movement. He intimated that it was peculiar that anyone should have gone over the heads of the State's attorney, the mayor, and the police department to bring a wholesale prosecution in such a matter. However, he ordered the cases continued, and those accused immediately held a meeting in the squad room of the Harrison police station and began arranging for the defense.

Attorney Morris has been retained by most of the defendants. He is an authority on all such cases, and has a reputation for winning. Several of the leading cigar men, however, will be represented by their own counsel, while a number of others have joined with the majority to retain Mr. Morris. Nearly sixty slot machines were taken by the police, and those against whom complaints have been filed include many of the most prominent cigar men and liquor men in town.

P. C. Wiggenhorn, a cigar broker of La Crosse, Wis., has accepted a position with Yerxa Brothers, a wholesale grocery firm in Minneapolis, Minn., and Fargo, N. Dak., to manage a cigar jobbing department, which the company has recently opened. He will continue his office in La Crosse.

The store of the United Cigar Stores branch of the tobacco trust at 81 Fifth avenue was entered by burglars a few nights ago and goods to the value of $100 were removed.

A billiard hall and cigar stand will be installed on the second floor of a building at 71-73 Van Buren street, while a restaurant will occupy the first floor and basement.

Sol. Westerfeld, a West Side retail merchant, has been elected president of a new State organization of retail merchants, united to fight peddlers and mail-order houses and to oppose national legislation looking to the establishment of a parcels post.

The Pilsen Catering Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital of $2,500, to do a restaurant and liquor business. V. Bolek, R. Sedlacek, and H. Tauber are the incorporators.

The cigar store of M. Baumgartel, 93 Twenty-second street, was the scene last week of a lively revolver battle between policemen and burglars. Seventy-two shots were fired and no one was hurt, but the interior of the store was a sight to behold. The two burglars, however, were captured. The affray occurred at 1 o'clock New Year's morning. Four policemen passing found the door open and entered. They were fired on, and hunted cover behind counters and cases and returned the fire. Fifty boxes of cigars and other material had been packed up by the thieves ready for removal.

John Wardlow, president of the Ruy Lopez Company, Key West, was a Chicago visitor last week. He is well known among Chicago cigar men, but this was his first visit for three years.

Plans for a $3,000,000 28-story hotel at La Salle and Madison streets are now well under way, and probably the work will begin within the year. The building will cost about $2,000,000 and the furniture and equipment another million.

Shutan & Co., Chicago, have been incorporated to deal in tobacco. Their capital is $10,000. Incorporators are E. and S. Shutan and W. Shea.

Business has been fair, with a dearth of traveling men in town.

MAXIMO.

TOBACCO TRUST AT BOTTOM OF TROUBLE.

The Society of Equity disclaims responsibility for the attacks upon person and property, as labor unions always disclaim responsibility for violence, but there is no doubt that these masked night-raiders who have destroyed crops and burned barns are carrying out the purpose of the antitrust combination. They are using violence and intimidation for the purpose of making the union of growers effective. It is an evil and lawless state of things which nothing will excuse, but it is the effect of an uprising against a monopoly which is believed to be oppressive and which exists in violation of law. When the law fails to protect any people against oppression there is great danger that they will try to protect themselves, and then there is sure to be disorder and violence and the perpetration of lawlessness upon others. The tobacco trust is at the bottom of this outbreak in Kentucky and Tennessee. (New York Journal of Commerce.)

THE TRUST IS FIGHTING HARD—ITS LAWYERS ARE OFFERING MORE AND MORE OPPOSITION AT THE SESSIONS IN THE TRIAL OF THE SUIT OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

At the resumption of the case Tuesday the first witness called was A. H. Hillman, of the A. H. Hillman Company, the well-known independent jobbing concern. Mr. Hillman answered all questions propounded in course of the cross-examination by the tobacco trust counsel, including those which he had declined to answer when on the stand some days earlier.

Mr. Hillman stated that his greatest year's business in the last five years would approximate about $325,000, and no more. He explained that his business fluctuated greatly, because if he had a good thing and the manufacturers sold out to the tobacco trust, he would lose it.

The second witness Tuesday was George W. Coan, secretary and treasurer of the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company branch of the tobacco trust. Mr. Coan was asked to explain various letters, both incoming and outgoing, concerning the internal affairs of the Reynolds branch of the trust.

It appeared from the correspondence that the Lipfert Scales Company and the Spencer Company formed a little clique, which was directed by the Reynolds branch, and the Reynolds branch, in turn, was directed from 111 Fifth avenue.

Considerable correspondence was submitted concerning the Tawney bill which was before Congress two years ago. Many of these letters were signed by "J. Parker," of the law department of the tobacco trust. The letters ordered the Spencer and Lipfert Scales companies to oppose by all means in their power the Tawney bill, which provided for the abolition of all gift coupons in connection with tobacco products.

Some of the branch companies were not going to commit themselves either way in regard to the Tawney bill, while others were going to oppose it, but they were ordered by the trust to put up a stiff fight against the measure.

Coan testified that R. J., William, and R. M. Reynolds, D. Rich, and M. Hoffman were directors of the Reynolds branch of the trust and all were regular employees except Hoffman.

William B. Hornblower, counsel for the Imperial Tobacco Company branch of the tobacco trust, asked Coan questions tending to prove that the Imperial and Reynolds companies had no direct connection.

Coan testified that C. C. Dula and James B. Duke never attended directors' meetings of the Reynolds Company, so far as he knew. They might have done so without his knowledge.

Coan testified that the Reynolds branch of the trust was principally a plug-tobacco concern, but made some smoking tobacco. In 1900 it bought the Bond business, the Brown business, and the Hanes Company, and the growth has more than doubled since then. The manufacture of smoking tobacco was a small portion of the business in 1900, but it has grown enormously since that time.

Thomas B. Fuller, of the Golden Belt Manufacturing Company, of Durham, N. C., a company which manufactures tobacco bags and pouches, was a witness Monday. He was forced to admit that the tobacco trust owned about 93 or 94 per cent of the stock of the Golden Belt Company. He stated that he was the principal owner of the remaining six or eight shares. He asserted that practically all of his business was done with and for the tobacco trust. He asserted that he tried to get outside business by casual solicitation, which was done entirely by correspondence. It developed that the Golden Belt Company had no salesmen on the road. Mr. Fuller stated that the capitalization of this company was $700,000.

TRUST LAWYER WANTED A WRIT.

The most interesting phase of the case Monday morning was the fact disclosed by Delancey Nicoll, of counsel for the tobacco trust, that application had been made in the United States court for a writ requiring A. H. Hillman, of the Hillman Company, to appear and produce his books and papers and answer questions concerning the volume of his business, thus showing whether it had increased or diminished since the organization of the tobacco trust.

WITNESS INFORMED OF HIS RIGHTS.

Mr. Hillman had been asked various questions last week by counsel for the trust concerning the details of his business, and he was advised by Attorney-General McReynolds that he probably had a legal right to refuse to answer. Mr. Hillman appealed to Mr. McReynolds, asking him whether it was advisable to refuse. Mr. McReynolds advised him to consult his own convenience and do as he pleased. At that juncture Counselor Nicoll asserted with great heat that he would subpœna both Hillman and the books of the Hillman Company. Judge McReynolds retorted that the trust counsel could go ahead; that the Government would argue the point. Mr. Nicoll asserted that the tobacco trust should have the same right to subpœna witnesses and papers as the Government.

"Your clients are under investigation; Mr. Hillman isn't," retorted the Government counsel.

COUNSEL IN HEATED ARGUMENT.

Counsel for both sides became involved in a heated argument over this point Monday. Ex-Judge Wallace asserted that the point would be argued and decided whether the tobacco trust had the right to subpœna witnesses and papers or not. "We don't care so much about the testimony of this man Hillman," said Judge Wallace, "but we want to find out whether we have any rights or not, or whether we are going to be blocked."

VICE-PRESIDENT HARRIS RECALLED.

The first witness on the stand Monday morning was William R. Harris, vice-president of the American Tobacco Company and chairman of the board of directors of the British-American Tobacco Company. Mr. Harris has been on the stand several times and has been questioned at great length concerning the ramifications of the two branches of the tobacco trust with which he is officially connected. The method of leaf buying, the cooperative relations, the retail, manufacturing, and jobbing end of the business abroad and at home were the subjects which provided material for Mr. Harris's examination, as well as his correspondence. The questioning by the Government counsel elicited the fact that there was always more or less of a connection between all operations and tobacco trust headquarters at 111 Fifth avenue. On cross-examination the tobacco trust counsel tried to show that there was no absolute authority over things from 111 Fifth avenue, but in this they were unsuccessful.

FIGURES ON TOBACCO CONSUMPTION.

William R. Hains, in speaking of the consumption of tobacco, said that 48,000,000 or 50,000,000 pounds of leaf were issued annually in making granulated tobacco. One-half of the leaf grown went into the smoking tobaccos and the remainder into plug and cigarettes, he said.

He also stated that about 6,000,000 pounds of Turkish leaf were imported annually by the American Company.

DUKE'S OLD FRIEND BUTLER IS CALLED.

George P. Butler, of Butler-Butler, the cigarette manufacturers, was then summoned to the stand. In answer to the first question he stated that he did not at present have any regular business. He said that he had sold the business of Butler-Butler to the tobacco trust for $700,000. He asserted that he voluntarily suggested that a provision be incorporated in the bill of sale to the effect that he bound himself not to enter the tobacco business again during the next fifteen years. He stated that he volunteered to do this because he thought it would be the means of promoting good feeling between the tobacco trust people and himself.

TELLS OF WORK FOR TOM RYAN.

He admitted that he some years ago acquired an option upon the Liggett & Myers Company, of St. Louis, prior to its sale to the tobacco trust, and asserted that he represented a syndicate of gentlemen, namely, Gen. Samuel Thomas, Thomas F. Ryan, P. A. B. Widener, and S. A. Elkins. He stated, however, that the option only applied to the stock held by the Liggett heirs, including the stock of McCormack, Whitmore, and Halliwell, the latter the vice-president of that concern.

He was asked whether the purchase later of the Liggett & Myers Company was through the option he acquired and asserted that he did not remember.

DID BUSINESS WITH PERCY HILL.

He testified that Percival S. Hill was the man he did business with at No. 111 Fifth avenue, when he sold the cigarette, little cigar, and tobacco business of Butler-Butler to the tobacco trust. He claimed that Butler-Butler was absolutely independent of the tobacco trust until its purchase. He said that he was not a practical tobacco man, but he thought himself a practical sales manager.

Butler stated that he purchased stock of the Henry Clay & Bock Company for a syndicate of men in London.

He then described the establishment, financing, bankruptcy, and sale of the Universal Tobacco Company.

Butler then told of the different brands of cigarettes, little cigars, and tobaccos which Butler-Butler made. He was asked who his competitors were on the various brands, and he stated that the tobacco trust was—that is, of course, before his firm was sold out to the trust.

BIG OUTPUT OF TURKISH CIGARETTES.

He stated that the tobacco trust was his greatest competitor on Turkish cigarettes, with the exception of the 15-cent Turkish cigarette, and, in his opinion, Schinasi Brothers were the largest manufacturers of 15-cent Turkish cigarettes in the United States.

In response to the query of counsel as to who the competitors of Butler-Butler were on the Virginia cigarette, Mr. Butler stated that there was "a new man" who was growing with a Virginia cigarette.

COMING FACTOR IN CIGARETTE WORLD.

He said that he meant Frank D. Ware, of the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Company, manufacturers of White Rolls cigarettes. Mr. Butler said that the Ware-Kramer Company of late had been "mighty industrious."

At the termination of Tuesday's hearing in the Government suit against the tobacco trust, an adjournment was taken until Friday morning at 10 o'clock, unless unforeseen contingencies arise, then the case may be postponed until next week. William B. Hornblower, just prior to the adjournment Tuesday, requested that he be allowed to make a statement, which he wished incorporated in the record. He stated that as counsel for the Imperial Tobacco Company branch of the tobacco trust, he might advise his client not to produce the correspondence of W. C. Reed, the former general agent for the Imperial branch at Richmond, on the ground that it was a British corporation and that the authority to deliver the correspondence over should come from a resolution of the board of directors in England, or from the chief managing officer. Lawyer Hornblower stated, however, that he had an associate counsel for the Imperial branch of the trust at Richmond and he would confer with him respecting the course he would pursue. Special Attorney-General McReynolds stated that he would subpœna E. S. Carlton, the present general agent of the Imperial branch of the tobacco trust at Richmond, who succeeded Reed, and insist upon the production of the correspondence.

DAVID A. SCHULTE ON THE STAND.

The first witness at the resumption of the Government case Thursday morning was David A. Schulte, executive head of the A. Schulte stores. Mr. Schulte proved to be an exceptionally fine witness and his cross-examination by S. M. Stroock, of the law firm of Stroock & Stroock, counsel for the United Cigar Stores branch of the tobacco trust, was decidedly barren of benefit to the trust.

Mr. Schulte was asked concerning the length of his experience in the cigar business and replied fifteen years. Special Attorney-General McReynolds then questioned Mr. Schulte about all the ramifications of the retail business. In reply to the questions of the Government counsel concerning the effect of the operations of the United Cigar Stores Company upon the retail dealers, Mr. Schulte stated that he believed that the average retail dealer will eventually be driven out of business. He believed that his personal salvation lay in the fact that he had built up business on his own private brands and that people, in order to get his brands, which they liked because of their exceptionally good quality, returned to his stores and became regular customers. He stated that he did not handle tobacco trust cigars except when customers specially called for them, in which rare instances he furnished them.

Mr. Schulte testified that a man now has to own more stores than before the invasion of the United Stores Company, and that his profits had been reduced from 28 to 30 per cent to less than 15 per cent, owing to the cutthroat policy of the United Stores. He said that there was no doubt in his mind but that the United Stores were striving to monopolize the retail business of New York, and that he thought that all but a few independent dealers would eventually be forced to the wall. He testified that a great many small dealers had already been driven out of business. He said that he believed that about all the prominent jobbers in New York prior to the formation of the Metropolitan Tobacco Company had been forced out of business.

Mr. Schulte admitted that it was imperative that he handle tobacco trust cigarettes, as the trust had a considerable grip upon that commodity.

TENDENCY TO DRIVE OUT INDEPENDENTS.

"The inevitable tendency is to run the ordinary retailer out of business. If we were not doing business on our own brands of cigars we would be out of business now," said Mr. Schulte. "Several years we made a gross profit of 28 to 30 per cent; to-day on the tobacco trust goods it would be considerably under 15 per cent."

TRUST'S RETAIL STORES GROWING STRONGER.

"I think that without doubt the United Stores under their present policy will get stronger," continued Mr. Schulte, and he went on to explain that the 5 per cent inside granted by the tobacco trust enabled a profit of 10 per cent, where the independent retailer without that special privilege was able to make only 5 or 6 per cent.

"What percentage of the business in the Schulte stores consists of tobacco?" asked Judge McReynolds.

THE INIQUITOUS COUPON SYSTEM.

"Very little," replied Mr. Schulte. "Buyers of trust tobacco go to the United Stores and get the trust tobacco so that they can get the coupon. We get some business in tobacco on our own private brands."

"Have you any idea as to the effect in other cities of the operations of the United Cigar Stores?" asked Judge McReynolds.

"No; but I have no reason to think that it is any different from that in this city," responded Mr. Schulte.

DISAPPEARANCE OF THE JOBBER.

"How about cigarettes, smoking tobacco, and plug tobacco? Has there been any change in the jobbing of these since the advent of the tobacco trust among independent and separate jobbers located in New York City?"

"They have become less and less. The Metropolitan Tobacco Company now does about all the jobbing business."

"What percentage of the Schulte business is cigars?"

"I think our cigar business would be 80 per cent."

"What percentage of that 20 per cent remaining is Turkish cigarettes?"

"About 7 per cent."

"What percentage is smoking tobacco?"

"Very small, 2 or 3 per cent, possibly. The large part of the balance of my business is on little cigars. I am interested in a stock company which makes little cigars."

SCHULTE UNDER CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Upon cross-examination by Counselor Stroock, Mr. Schulte testified that he was interested in B. G. Davis & Co., a concern which makes some of his private brands of cigars, while I. Lewis & Co., of Newark, N. J., made his Schulte Generals; and the Falk Tobacco Company made his private brands in both tobacco and cigarettes. Mr. Schulte stated that he owned 50 per cent of the Davis Company and Mr. Davis the other 50 per cent.

SCHULTE TELLS OF HIS PLANS.

Mr. Schulte stated that he intended opening a store in Brooklyn, a new one in New York, at Duane and Center streets, also five stands in the Hudson Terminal buildings.

"Have you in contemplation the opening in other cities outside of New York?"

"Yes; Newark, but not seriously."

"Your business has been a very prosperous one, has it not, Mr. Schulte?"

SCHULTE BESTS TRUST LAWYER.

At this juncture Lawyer Stroock and Mr. Schulte engaged in some hot repartee. The tobacco trust lawyer tried to show that the Schulte stores had branched out since the advent of the United Stores and asked if that was not the fact.

"Yes," said Mr. Schulte, "but I am the exception."

"Do you know that there are more chain-store owners in New York to-day than ever before?" asked Stroock.

"Yes; but that does not make up for the independent dealers who have been driven out of business."

THE CORTLANDT STREET CORNER.

Stroock then asked about the cigar store at the corner of Cortlandt street and Broadway. "You knew that the United Company paid $9,500 a year for that store in the beginning, didn't you, Mr. Schulte?"

"I was told so."

"And didn't you come along and offer $16,500 for it and oust the United?"

"No; the real estate agent asked me if I would pay $16,500 for it, and I accepted."

"You held that lease three years, didn't you?"

"I think not; there was a contingent clause in the lease, but I think I gave up the store after two years."

STANDS IN THE TERMINAL BUILDING.

Stroock then asked about the Terminal buildings. "You have the exclusive right to sell cigars in those Terminal buildings?"

"No."

"How is that?"

"A club, a restaurant, or a café can sell cigars."

"Now, you have control of a large piece of property on Nassau street; you leased the building and put the United out, didn't you?"

"Yes; do you want to know how I did it?" Mr. Schulte intimated that he could accomplish the same things in real estate that the United could because he had the capital.

"You are a pretty good business man, aren't you, Mr. Schulte?"

"Oh, I wouldn't say that. If we can't make money on cigars, we'll make it on real estate."

"Your business has been pretty prosperous, hasn't it?"

"Oh, we've done pretty well, but we are the exception."

Another Thursday witness was A. H. Hillman of the A. H. Hillman Company, the well-known jobbers of independent goods, whose establishment is located at 435 and 437 Pearl street, New York. Mr. Hillman stated that he had been in the jobbing business over twenty years. He said that the Hillman Company was a corporation and that there were three stockholders in it besides himself. The Hillman Company, he stated, had been a corporation for the last five years, and before that it was a partnership under the firm name of Noyles & Hillman.

President Hillman estimated that there were about ten small jobbers in New York to-day. When asked as to the volume of business his company transacted he stated that it would go up to a certain point; then they would lose some profitable brand, owing to its being acquired by the tobacco trust, then the business of his company would drop again.

When asked if his company handled tobacco trust goods, Hillman said "No," and added that he did not want to do business for love. Mr. Hillman stated that he was supposed to get an inside price from the Butler-Butler branch of the tobacco trust, but asserted that he believed that he was getting no more than any other jobber and that he believed that the Butler representative was throwing a bluff.

President Hillman testified that he got inside prices from R. S. Sullivan, the manufacturer of the well-known 7-20-4 cigar and other brands; that he also got an inside price on Tellenettes from the Allen Tobacco Company; but those were about all the advantages he did get and 40 per cent of the cigar business he transacted was on Sullivan's brands. He said that he no longer made a specialty of Pall Mall cigarettes, made by Butler-Butler, as that concern had gone over to the tobacco trust.

He stated that Benjamin Hart, J. Lister, Albert Hillman, and himself owned stock in the Hillman company.

The tobacco trust counsel asked Mr. Hillman whether his total volume of business had not increased since the advent of the trust.

Hillman responded that his volume of business could not be estimated. Counsel for the tobacco trust tried to draw out Mr. Hillman. Special Attorney-General McReynolds advised Mr. Hillman that he need not answer unless he desired.

LICORICE CASES ADVANCED.

The motion to advance the cases of the McAndrews & Forbes Company and the G. S. Young Company against the United States was granted by the United States Supreme Court Monday. The two companies are subsidiary companies of the tobacco trust and are engaged in the manufacture and sale of licorice. They were fined by the United States district court of the southern district of New York last January, under the prosecution instituted by the Government under the Sherman antitrust law, and the companies are now appealing from the conviction.

SUIT AGAINST SNUFF DISTRIBUTERS.

[Special to Tobacco.]

JACKSON, MISS., January 13, 1908.

The most important antitrust suit in the legal history of the State will be called for argument before Chancellor Lyell during the term of chancery court which convened last week. The first case on the docket is that of the State of Mississippi against the American Snuff Company, the Walter Fisher Tobacco Company, of West Point, and the Carr-Williams Tobacco Company, of Jackson, in which the attorney-general seeks to oust these corporations from the State and collect penalties for violation of the antitrust laws aggregating nearly $2,000,000.

THE TOBACCO TRUST IN PORTO RICO—LEADING INSULAR NEWSPAPER COMPLAINS OF ITS UTTER DISREGARD OF THE LAW.

The following is a translation of an editorial printed in a recent issue of the Heraldo Español, the leading newspaper in the Spanish language published in Porto Rico. It is in the form of a direct appeal to the President of the United States to exert his powers to put an end to the utter disregard of the law by the tobacco trust in its operations in Porto Rico. The editorial reads as follows:

"It is more than a year ago that the Heraldo Español initiated its campaign against the Porto Rico invasion by the tobacco trust.

"No one noticed the increasing and spreading proportions of its absorbing policy.

"On the event of the President's message, wherein he already pointed out the evil preponderance and despised methods employed by some corporations, we called attention to the fact that, while in the United States, or better say, on the Continent, these corporations were duly prosecuted and investigated by the judiciary branch of the Government, in Porto Rico they were not only breaking the law ostentatiously, but, what is more, they enjoyed to a certain extent the most open cooperation from the insular government.

"The Foraker bill, we should say the Porto Rico constitution, voted by the legislative branches of the American Government, and approved by the President, provided in one of its chapters: 'That no corporation shall be allowed to hold, control, or acquire more than 500 acres of land.'

"It is not a hidden fact that this law has been openly broken by the Porto Rico American Tobacco Company, Porto Rico Leaf Tobacco Company, or the tobacco trust, as it is called, and it would not be a very difficult task to show that even the children in Porto Rico know that said corporations own thousands of acres of land in Porto Rico.

"The aforesaid law has been especially provided for the protection of our landowners and small farmers against the voracious and unscrupulous methods used in their acquisition by the tobacco trust.

"Now that in the United States the tobacco trust and its subsidiary companies are under a civil process before the court of justice; now that even criminal prosecution has been instituted by the Attorney-General against these malefactors of any corporation that through illegal deals and questionable purchases has been entitled to, we heartily look for, with earnestness, that said processes and investigations be extended to Porto Rico, where, we venture to say, a good many things may be found, not only in the special law above pointed out, but perhaps even in the primitive purchase of that branch of the tobacco trust.

"Obvious to say that the law should be tried to be evaded, but all Porto Rico knows that these lands spoken of belong to the tobacco trust, and it will be an easy matter in a public investigation to compel the officials to acknowledge the truth.

"It is a common saying in this island that no man is more clever in his dealings than an inveterate crook.

"We had to praise the President for the energetic and active campaign against the principles of 'dishonesty in business,' in spite of the influence and obstacles brought to bear upon him, and even the financial crisis that some people—those affected by the flash of light thrown by him—want to throw the blame on him, which to any clear intelligence appear to be out of its own causes.

"Before we close this editorial here are several questions to the President:

"SIR: While you are so strenuous in your efforts to punish criminals, irrespective of their social or financial position in the States, would you forget this unfortunate island under still worse conditions, evaded through distance, and that our cries should not be heard yonder?

"The law to protect our landlord is cynically violated.

"You are trying to extirpate a social evil in your own land; would you let these dependencies, these small islands, be destroyed by the same pernicious wrong that is already injected to its very bones?

"The American people are strongly constituted economically, and nevertheless the spirit of democracy and individual liberty rebels against that evil. What would be the future of Porto Rico, at present going through a very abnormal state, politically, socially, and economically?

"The last one the most dreadful of all."

A TOBACCO TRUST MASQUERADER—JOHNSTON TIN FOIL AND METAL COMPANY, OF ST. LOUIS, FALSELY PRETEND TO BE INDEPENDENT.

In the trial of the United States Government's suit against the tobacco trust last week, John Conley, jr., treasurer of the tin-foil branch of the tobacco trust, testified that the trust's ownership of the Johnston Tin Foil and Metal Company, of St. Louis, was kept secret, but that the only object in doing so was to prevent a strike in the St. Louis plant.

There was, so Conley claimed, a good deal of trouble between the trust and its employees in the New York tin-foil works, and they were afraid that if the employees in St. Louis learned that both concerns were under the same ownership there would be a sympathetic strike. It was implied that after all union hands had been gotten rid of in the New York plant, and wages reduced as near the starvation point as possible, then similar steps would be taken to bring the hands in the St. Louis works down to a similar level, but until the troubles at the New York end were disposed of, they wanted to keep things running smoothly in the western plant.

But independent tobacco manufacturers, and others in a position to know, say that not only was the matter kept secret from the employees in the tobacco trust's western tin-foil works, but that the independent trade was given to understand that the Johnston Company was absolutely free from any connection of any kind with the tobacco trust. It is also said that this branch of the trust attempted to fool the independent tobacco manufacturers by sending them elaborately lithographed calendars, bearing statements in plain English to the effect that the Johnston company was not in any way connected with the trust.

WHY THE SOUTH HATES THE TRUST.

The American Tobacco Company and most of its affiliations are manned chiefly by officials hailing from the South. Its president was born, bred, and started his business career in the South, and there is hardly a Southerner living who has, by preference, given so many young men from the South a chance to become successful men in business and to accumulate fortunes as did Mr. Duke.

And yet the most violent opposition and most implacable hostility to the vast corporation created and administered by southern genius, push, and capacity manifest themselves in the South, and the prosecutions instituted against the American Tobacco Company are perhaps due more to the agitation of the southern tobacco raisers and their representatives in Congress than to any other instrumentality.

The South is generally supposed to be the most clannish section of the country, their clannishness in politics, for instance, being so thick and fast as to be positively ruinous for many of their vital interests, but in regard to its most pronounced offspring, the American Tobacco Company, the prejudicial sentiment of southern clannishness seems to have vanished into a myth.

Can any reasonable explanation be offered for such an extreme change in sentiment and surprising manifestation of irrational action? (Editorial in one of the two trade papers that are vying with each other in their efforts to please the tobacco trust.)

While the great mass of the honest, chivalrous, warm-hearted men of the South are what they are to-day, their attitude must ever be one of implacable hostility to the tobacco trust and all that it typifies.

While human nature is human nature and will assert itself the world over, Tobacco believes that there is an instinct and a tradition animating the people of the Southland that holds them truer and more steadfast to high ideals than are the people in any other section of the United States. True, there are exceptions, as to every general rule, and men have come out of the South who have been ready to trample every consideration of right and decency under their feet, so long as their lusts and passions were gratified.

But Tobacco knows that southern chivalry is something more than an empty word, and that taken as a whole the great mass of the white population of the South are honest, upright, God-fearing people, with a wholesome regard for both moral and civil law, and an inborn abhorrence of greed, corruption, and chicanery.

The chivalrous, high-minded people of the South naturally do not take kindly to such an institution as the tobacco trust, which the great southern editor, Col. Henry Watterson, has but recently characterized in the following scathing language:

"According to all available information, it has employed the tactics of the pirate, the pickpocket, and the porch climber in its efforts to crush out honest competition."

The generous, great-hearted Southerners are properly resentful when the swashbucklers of the tobacco trust say to a southern gentleman who is honestly endeavoring to start in business on his own account:

"If you start that factory, we will follow you to the gates of hell, and crush hell out of you and your new company. We will do this by fair means or foul."

The conservative, thinking people of the South can hardly fail to see a grave menace to American institutions in a combination guilty of bringing about such conditions as have been editorially summed up by the Lexington Herald in the following language:

"The consumers and producers of tobacco are paying each year millions of dollars upon stock which represents nothing except the capitalization of the violation of the law. * * * It has been organized and is being conducted in violation of the fundamental principles of law and equity and morals. Through its efforts to control the cigar stores, individuals have been ruined by its unfair competition; through its power to control the prices of tobacco, whole communities have been thrown into a state of lawlessness and hundreds of families put into what is practical want."

The righteous, law-abiding people of the South have no sympathy with the lawlessness of the tobacco trust, and they therefore earnestly and enthusiastically applauded their own Congressman STANLEY when, more than a year ago, he declared in the Halls of Congress:

"I rejoice that justice is at last ready to unsheath her tardy sword; that God's wrath no longer slumbers. I demand, sir, that the law as it is written be rigorously, quickly, and mercilessly enforced by fine and by imprisonment; that these haughty bandits be brought to the bar of justice; that they be clad in the loathsome garb of guilt, and, if possible, confined in 'a felon's cell—the fittest earthly type of hell.' I declare that an ordinary convict should feel like an honest man when compared with the conduct of the American Tobacco Company in the last five years."

And realizing, as they do, all that is hateful and odious that the tobacco trust embodies, the people of the Southland are doubly rejoiced that it is one of their own sons—Judge McReynolds—who is to-day bearing the brunt of the splendid fight which the United States Government is making against Duke and his associates.

TRUST'S DIRTY WORK IN CHICAGO—DUKE'S DISCIPLES SPENT NEARLY $2,000 FOR PETTY PERSECUTION OF INDEPENDENT DEALERS.

[Special to Tobacco.]

CHICAGO, January 13, 1908.

It has been ascertained beyond a doubt that the United Cigar Stores branch of the tobacco trust caused the recent wholesale arrests of independent cigar dealers in Chicago for technical violations of the ordinance against slot machines.

It was learned that Lloyd C. Whitman, the lawyer who secured the warrants, and the six private detectives who developed the evidence, were all hired by the tobacco trust, at an expense of nearly $2,000. Practically every independent cigar dealer in the downtown district of Chicago was subjected to this form of petty persecution, and forced to appear in court. The presiding judge recognized that the cases had not been brought through the regular State's attorney's office, and but for the temporary absence of the representative of that office attached to the court in which the cases were brought, Judge Newcomer would have summarily dismissed the complaints in each case. As it was, he continued the cases until January 30, and expressed himself most emphatically against a concern like the tobacco trust seeking to employ the machinery of his court in such a manner in an effort to cripple its business competitors.

The fact that the tobacco trust was not acting in good faith in the matter is proven by the fact that up to within about four weeks of the date when it caused the raids to be made upon the independent dealers the same kind of slot machines as those concerning which the trust's attorney complained were in operation in practically all of the Chicago stores of the tobacco trust. Indeed, the spotters hired by the trust were already at work gathering evidence concerning the slot machines in the independent stores before the devices were removed from the tobacco-trust stores.

As a few saloon keepers were raided at the same time as the independent cigar dealers, the Saloon Keepers' Protective League has passed resolutions condemning the tobacco trust, and the league members have pledged themselves to do everything in their power to discourage the distribution and sale of tobacco-trust products and the patronage of the tobacco-trust stores. All in all this latest raid by the trust seems likely to prove a good deal of a boomerang.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that it is the purpose of all the members of the committee that made up the bill to explain it at length at the close of the general debate. I say this for the reason that members of the committee may think it strange that there has been no definite explanation of the bill as to what it carries. I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a matter of congratulation to the Democrats on this side of the Chamber, as well as to the Democrats throughout the country, that the joint debate between Democrats and Republicans that has been going on on this floor for several days has taken place. In many respects it has been a notable debate and will be so accepted in the future political history of the country. This debate, in my opinion, has in a most remarkable manner developed the views and position of both of the great political parties of our country upon many vital political as well as economic questions. I think it has furnished the Democrats splendid campaign material. The veil has been drawn back just enough, and the curtain has been raised sufficiently high, in my humble opinion—while I am not acting in the rôle of counseling my party—to point out plainly and with emphasis just exactly the issue upon which the Democrats should go into the coming campaign. I believe that the issue is a revision of the tariff along broad, business, common-sense lines, in the interest of the masses of the people. The tariff reform issue, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, will clarify the atmosphere for the Democrats. It will solidify the friends of Democracy throughout the entire country. It will invite great accessions from the dissatisfied and discontented ranks of the Republican party, and, in my humble judgment, will give the Democracy next November one of the grandest victories it has ever achieved. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, this issue, to my mind, is the paramount issue; it is greater in public estimation to-day—in the public mind—than the digging of the Panama Canal. It is far more important to the country than the question of "imperialism" or when freedom shall be given to the Philippine Islands. It is much greater, in my opinion, than the question of the regulation of unreasonable rates and unfair rebates and discriminations of the railroads. It is a great deal more important than the suppression of the unnamed "malefactors" that were so vigorously assailed in the President's message communicated to Congress a few days since. I say it stands preeminent over all other issues. It is one that the public will grasp. It is on the question of tariff that the Republican party is weak. With such an issue the Democratic party would go to the country on one of its great and fundamental principles. I was reading but last night that within the last eleven months of the year of 1907, up to the close of the month of November, something over $15,000,000 of hides had been imported into this country subject to a tariff of 15 per cent under the Dingley law. During the same period quite $20,000,000 of goatskins were imported free of duty. A brief history of this duty on hides may be of service. The record shows that under the tariff of 1842—called a protective tariff—the duty on hides was 5 per cent, and 4 per cent under the tariff of 1857, the lowest tariff since 1812. In March, 1861, the tariff on hides was raised to 5 per cent and increased in December, 1861, to 10 per cent, and that remained unchanged until 1873, and from that date hides were on the free list until the Dingley tariff of 1897 raised the rate to 15 per cent. In a strong letter, one of the greatest commoners of our Republic, James G. Blaine, vigorously protested against the tariff on hides. He wrote as follows to Mr. McKinley:

WASHINGTON, April 10, 1890.

DEAR MR. MCKINLEY: It is a great mistake to take hides from the free list, where they have been for so many years. It is a slap in the face to the South Americans with whom we are trying to enlarge our trade. It will benefit the farmer by adding 5 to 8 per cent to the price of his children's shoes. It will yield a profit to the butcher only—the last man that needs it. The movement is injudicious from beginning to end—in every form and phase. Pray stop it before it sees light. Such movements as this for protection will protect the Republican party into a speedy retirement.

Yours, hastily, JAMES G. BLAINE.

Hon. WILLIAM MCKINLEY,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee.

Yet the Republican party holds in its greedy grasp to-day a higher duty on hides than Mr. Blaine protested against, and it is just by such instances as this that the Republican party stands discredited before the people. I am not making any complaint that the goatskins are on the free list. That is all right. I have no doubt that it vitalized and gave great energy and impulse to a great many business enterprises in the country, and added great wealth to the masses of the people, without favoring any special interest. But we all know that the 15 per cent tariff, as laid upon those raw hides, is simply and alone for the benefit of the beef trust. Nobody can question that. Our manufacturers declare that with the tax on hides removed they could make and sell shoes cheaper to our own people and at the same time increase their export trade. To make this tax more iniquitous the beef trust sells those imported hides to such foreigners as come here to buy them cheaper than to our own home people. The people of the great State of Massachusetts feel the wrong and injustice of this tax more keenly than any other section of the Union, and their Representatives on this floor have freely spoken out on the subject. It is just such instances as this, one of which I have named—and I could name many, many others—that have wrought up public opinion to such an extent that it demands to-day that the trust methods of this country shall stop—fostered and sheltered and fattened as the trusts are under the Dingley tariff law—that it shall stop now, by the action of this Congress; and there is but one way to stop it, and that way is known to all men who are frank enough to speak out. The Republicans have done a power of talking, but they are expected to act now. The people are getting down to the facts of the case. They understand that the Republican party can stop this evil, and that you can and must do it, by revising the tariff and revising it in the interests of the people and not in the interests of the trusts and combinations. [Applause.]

That is the proposition. The people are rapidly getting on to this idea, and you can not prevent them from speaking out, as they are doing all over the country. They have been a long time in "catching on." They know that the products of this country, manufactured as they are in this country by the highest and best paid and most skillful labor in the world, are carried over to foreign countries, and, after paying transportation charges, are there, practically in a free-trade market, sold cheaper than the same products of that foreign country and much cheaper than they are sold to our own people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] All this talk about surplus and about increasing the foreign trade and "occasional" sales has simply been a bubble in the air and has exploded. The people realize that, and they understand it, and they are going to act on it if they have a fairly reasonable chance in the coming November. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this is an opportune time, during the progress of this joint debate that is going on, when we should refer just for a little while—not going back for many, many years—to the history of the Republican party in connection with the subject of the revision of the tariff. It is very well understood that that class of the Republican party that are called "stand-patters"—and they dictate the real policies of the party—have declared, and there is no question about this issue, and no man doubts it, and we can go to the country clearly and fully on it, without any denial being made—have declared that, whatever the conditions may be, no schedule of the Dingley tariff, 4,000 in number, however important it may be or however unimportant it may be, notwithstanding whatever demand for relief there may be or the oppression it may create, shall be touched, revised, handled, or even discussed, if they have their own way, until "after the next Presidential election, and then only by its friends." That is a clear issue that is made. It is a clear-cut one, and can be easily understood, and is in every respect tangible. I ask what reason is there to-day to give the Republican party or its leaders credit or confidence for sincerity in that statement? Have they done anything on that subject that has led the people honestly and worthily to give them confidence?

Is not their record one of violated pledges? What I ask is the true analysis of this proposition: Do we find in its solution that the welfare of the people of the country was the objective end? No sane man can so contend. Even the leaders of the Republican party, who declare that the tariff will be revised "after the Presidential election," do not think that the country will take them seriously. Of course, they do not calculate that the Democrats may be in part power of the Government after the next Presidential election, because they say that they are "the friends" to the tariff and must do "the revising." I do not hesitate to say that these stand-pat leaders of the Republican party are the loyal "friends" to the present tariff system, upon which the great trusts of this country have fattened. They are the acknowledged "friends" to the system that is to-day plundering the masses of the people of their honest earnings; and they are engaged now in the "hide-and-seek" game of politics to extend the grinding powers of arrogant corporations and trusts by seeking to allay the fears of consumers with promises that they have so often disregarded about the revision of the tariff. The whole situation is, that these leaders do not believe that it is to the interest of the Republican party to revise the tariff at this Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What have we here from the able and distinguished majority leader of the House, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]? He is as much the mouthpiece of the stand-pat Republicans as is the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and in a notable correspondence in the month of March, 1906, the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], what did the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] say on that subject? Listen to it:

Congress is not prepared to review the tariff schedules in that calm, judicial frame of mind so necessary to the proper preparation of the tariff act, at a time so near the coming Congressional elections.

This quotation from the letter of the gentleman from New York was in reply to a letter from the gentleman from Massachusetts:

M'CALL'S LETTER TO PAYNE.

MARCH 21, 1906.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. PAYNE: Referring to our conversations concerning a revision of the tariff, I desire to bring to your attention, for the purpose of making clear the attitude of the Republican Members of the Massachusetts delegation, the declaration of the platform of the Massachusetts Republicans adopted by their State convention on the 6th of last October.

After announcing adherence to the policy of protection and opposition to "tariff changes tending to depress or destroy any of our industries or to lower the wages of American labor," the platform urged the Senators and Representatives from Massachusetts to "continue to press upon their party associates in Congress from other States the wisdom of a consideration of the tariff for the purpose of revision and readjustment." This declaration was at least not inconsistent with the last national Republican platform, which, referring to the tariff, declared that "rates of duty should be readjusted only when conditions have so changed that the public interest demands their alteration," and that "to a Republican Congress and a Republican President this great question can safely be intrusted."

The country voted to intrust the question to a Republican President and a Congress strongly Republican in both Houses. If revision is not to be considered at the present session, it is extremely unlikely that it will be secured during the life of the present Congress, for the next session will be so short as to suffice for little more than the passage of the appropriation bills. On behalf, therefore, of the Republican Members from Massachusetts who believe that during the nine years since the enactment of the existing duties "conditions have so changed that the public interest demands their alteration," and, who, at a meeting delegated me to make the request, I ask a consideration of the tariff by the Committee on Ways and Means with a view to its revision and readjustment.

Sincerely, yours, S. W. MCCALL.

That is the picture held up for the people to look at. What faith will an outside honest man have in any promise made by these leaders to revise the tariff? So near what? The Presidential election? No, No! The New York statesman, the leader of the majority, said in 1906, as an excuse, "So near the Congressional election." Now, since the Congressional election excuse for not taking up the tariff schedules for revision has performed its allotted part, the distinguished majority leader, speaking for his party, told a delegation of manufacturers who visited him at the Capitol a few days since in this city of the unwisdom of even appointing a tariff commission or doing anything looking to a revision of the tariff because we are "at the heels of a financial panic and on the eve of a Presidential campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, I tell you, Mr. Chairman, I could go back a few years and present broken promises by the Republicans all along the line; but here is the mouthpiece of the Republican party on the floor of the House who is speaking.

I wish to tell the committee that, in my judgment, the kind of platform that they are going to put up at Chicago will be about this. I read it from the American Economist, published in New York, November 29, 1907. The editor is a stand-patter of the highest character, and he stands with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. What kind of a platform does he tell these gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber they have to make? Whether they obey him or not, that is the question; but his is a voice from your own side, and here it is:

Resolved, That we are opposed to any disturbance of the present tariff law until conditions have so changed that the public interest demands a change in rates of duty and until it can be shown that less injury will result than could be accomplished by such action.

This is substantially the platform that the stand-patters will adopt at Chicago, for there is no sentiment favorable to any kind of a revision in the heart of a genuine stand-patter. I will read in a moment the platform of 1904 of the Republican party; but before doing that it might be of aid in testing the sincerity of the promise to revise the tariff after the election. Nothing in the world could have brought the average stand-patter of the party to such a promise except he was coerced by public opinion—supplemented by dissatisfaction in his own ranks. There are a great number of them who are tariff revisionists and who would have gladly entered on the work of revision at the beginning of the Sixtieth Congress, and an explanation when they go back to their constituents in the coming campaign will be in order. It was that element that coerced the stand-pat leaders to make promises that in some way or the other there shall be hammered into the Chicago platform in June a promise to revise the tariff after the election.

The stand-patter of to-day believes that we should have prohibitive tariffs for all raw manufactured products possible to our country and a subsidiary for industries which can not be reached by duties, such as ship navigation. The true theory of the stand-patter is that high protection causes the manufacture of the article to become profitable; and he believes when it becomes profitable, then capital rushes in to take advantage of that fact, and this results in such competition that the price of the article would fall lower than the price of the same article abroad. But the fact is that the theory does not work out that way, and he knows it; but just as soon as the price commences coming down by reason of competition a combination to keep them up is formed and the people suffer accordingly.

The last platform of the Republican party, 1904, is as follows:

We insist upon the maintenance of the principles of protection and therefore rates of duty should be readjusted only when conditions have so changed that the public interest demands their alteration; but this work can not be safely committed to any other hands than those of the Republican party; to intrust this to the Democratic party is to invite disaster.

It seems to me that in all respects a far greater disaster than ever occurred under a Democratic Administration has befallen the country recently which can not be laid at the door of our party. I refer, of course, to the present Republican financial panic that brought the greatest financial wrecks and in which great fortunes melted and disappeared in the hot air of speculation. Stocks and securities of all kinds shrunk to worthlessness and the country stood in alarm in the fear of general bankruptcy. Well, what are the conditions? If a condition does not exist to-day that justifies a revision of the tariff, in the name of common sense when can such conditions ever be brought about? We are in the midst of the greatest financial stringency and crash that we have had for years and years. The people, catching the spirit of alarm that numbed our whole unsafe financial system, rushed on the banks and demanded their money. We all deplore its existence, but banks are still failing around us, and we would be "short" in memory if we did not recall what the strenuous Republicans used to say about 1893 when a bank failed, why it had "gone Democratic." You have had a large number of banks "going Republican" of late. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We regret it very much. A few days ago in the great State of New York the New Amsterdam National Bank and the Mechanics and Traders' Bank failed, one capitalized at $1,000,000, with liabilities of more than $4,000,000, the other capitalized at $2,000,000, with $20,000,000 of deposits, and yet we are not at the end of it. Armies of laboring people are scouring the country, looking and begging for work; soup houses are multiplying throughout the country; confidence has fled from business circles, and yet with these conditions on us the Republican party declares that all that does not justify a revision of the tariff in the interest of the people. Why, I just want to quote from a leading Republican what the conditions are. We are all advised that the Dingley tariff is the oldest tariff; that it has stood longer than any other tariff since the beginning of this Government. It has been there about eleven years, and my advice and information is that but about twenty material changes have been made during all that time. Before I read from the distinguished Republican I will read from James W. Van Cleave, president of National Association of Manufacturers, as to what he thinks about it. He is a Republican, a manufacturer, and represents the greatest manufacturing interests in this country. Listen to what he says:

Do the reactionaries realize that in 1909, when the President who will be elected this year will be inaugurated, the Dingley tariff will be twelve years old? Can any of them cite a single tariff act, from the one which President Washington signed on July 4, 1789, down to the Dingley law, which President McKinley approved in 1897, which has had such a long life without change as the present statute?

Vast changes—political, social, physical, economic—have been taking place all over the globe in the eleven years which have passed since President McKinley put his signature to the present tariff act. Apparently, however, nobody has told the standpatters about any of these things. Or, if they have heard about them, they think they are of no particular consequence.

The invention of additional labor-saving appliances, the extension of the use of steam and electricity into new fields, the development of new products, the alteration in fashions and habits, the establishment of industries unknown a few years ago, the advent of new commodities in the marts of the world, the creation of new needs, and the opening of new markets among many peoples in various parts of the earth have made a sweeping transformation in the world's industrial system in this interval.

In the rolling years everything on the earth changes—everything except the tariff. The stand-pat reactionaries tell us that the physical and the social laws which decree changes in everything else which man utilizes or fashions, or which ministers to man's needs, must be suspended in the case of the tariff act which was passed in 1897.

The one general, universal rule of change applies to all mundane affairs except the revision of the Dingley tariff. Do you suppose that a common-sense, patriotic, intelligent people are going to accept that stuff any longer? No. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have a right to refer to a speech made by a distinguished Republican at the other end of the Capitol, to whom I referred a moment since. Listen to him on this tariff question that the stand-patters have said you can not touch; that it is too sacred to touch it until "after the election." Does anybody think that the welfare of this great country of ours had anything on earth to do with that agreement? Why, no! No man outside of an asylum would pretend to contend that that was what they were looking after. They were looking after the perpetuation and the interest of the Republican party, and they were afraid of a division in their ranks if the subject was taken up at all. Here is a great political party that has been for years in control of this Government, lacking the courage and the manhood to stand up and do what is right for the benefit of all the people, and "dodging" out of it for the sake of perpetuating their own party rule. I now read from a speech from Senator BEVERIDGE. What does he say about it?

OUR TARIFF A GENERATION OLD.

The want of classifications of our tariff is as bad as the want of facts. Nearly all our tariff classifications are more than a generation old. This is because each time the tariff has been revised the committees have taken the language of the old classifications. Not one of them is sympathetic, accurate, and up-to-date. The result is that the importer frequently does not know what classification his imports are under, and therefore what duty he must pay. The appraiser first decides this question, then the importer appeals to the General Board of Appraisers, and finally to the courts. There have been 600,000 such disputes since the present law was enacted. Decisions of the Treasury Department on the subject of the tariff fill seventeen great volumes. The decisions of the courts add many more, and remember that two-thirds of our imports are for the use of American manufacturers. This has cost importers and the Government millions of dollars; the importers many millions more. It has disturbed business which has not known what to depend upon. And the whole cost has finally fallen on the people.

And yet they say that "conditions" have not arisen which would justify them in revising the tariff. Now, we all admit that of all the great interests of this country that have been truly and greatly benefited by the tariff, this is the manufacturing interest. Now, I read from a leading manufacturer, and it does seem to me that, as a matter of fact, in talking to common-sense people, that man ought to be listened to, and not only his individual statement, but his statement as the representative of a great manufacturing association. I refer to Mr. Miles, who is president of the National Association of Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers, and my recollection now is that the amount of exports from this country in 1906—consisting of locomotives, stationary engines and machinery, of implements of agriculture and vehicles, cars, sewing machines manufactured here, and other things of that class—is $700,000,000, every dollar of which is sold in foreign countries cheaper than you can buy the same products here. What does he say in a letter that he wrote, and which has been quoted frequently? He says this:

When Congress gave us 45 per cent, we needing only 20 per cent, they gave us a Congressional permit, if not an invitation, to consolidate, form one great trust, and advance our prices 25 per cent, being the difference between the 20 per cent needed and the 45 per cent given. This difference would give a net annual profit to my company, only, of from $500,000 to $600,000, and to the industry at large a net increase in profit of sixty to seventy-five millions. If fifty millions, that would be, by the time that it passed through its immediate hands, to the agricultural consumers, approximately $100,000,000.

Now, that is a manufacturer who had been getting the benefit of the tariff. Why does he come and bear testimony against these things? Why, it is simply this: He sees the great indignation that has been wrought in the public mind by reason of these wrongs and injustice. He believes that these wrongs have gone to such an extent that the indignation of the people will be so great that they will rise up and overthrow the Republican party, and so he is trying to get them to revise the tariff and save the Republican party. That is the only logical solution that I can make of it. And again he says, not as an individual, but as the chairman of a tariff committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, that he is alarmed about it:

Standing on this platform, about 40 per cent of all the members of our association, who have by correspondence pronounced for revision, declare in their letters that their own schedules may properly be reduced 50 per cent or more without hurt to their respective industries or to the country at large. Others name a less amount, while only a few declare for no reduction. The letters in satisfaction of this statement are on file in the office of the president of the association in St. Louis, and are known to the managing officers of the association.

But here we are, with the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, having been in session since last December, and with a solemn declaration that the "conditions" have not arisen, that they have not occurred which would justify Congress in granting relief for these great wrongs and oppressions and this injustice to the people. That is why I say let the national Democracy stand for revision of the tariff, fair, just, business-like, common sense, in the interests of the masses of the people. Let that be the Democratic slogan, and we will restore our party to power next November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Of the reform tariff issue the Republicans are afraid. That is where they fear attack. Let "imperialism alone," let all those questions pass, and stand faithfully by fundamental Democratic tenets, excluding and rejecting all modern "isms" unknown to our creed, and invite all Democrats and friends of our party and the men who are the friends of the people, whether Republicans or Populists, to join us in this great crusade to restore our Government to the control of the people—a Government of law administered alike to all. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I can not persuade myself that the leaders of the Republican party are ignorant of the great moral revolution that has taken place in the public mind within the last two years. They are bound to see it. Why, Mr. Chairman, have we not had revelations made to us all over this country about "swollen fortunes," "predatory wealth," and the lawlessness of the "criminal rich?" Necessarily such utterances have produced a disturbed mental condition among the people. It has produced unrest and a feeling of envy among those less fortunate than others; and if you want to analyze the conditions that we are in to-day, find the true solution of it, I put to you, Mr. Chairman, this proposition: What in the ordinary affairs of life is better calculated to produce that feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction that pervades the public mind to-day than to let a man, or a number of men, who live by the sweat of their face, year after year, sit by and see the honest earnings of their labor and the toil of their lives, taken from them and their families under the guise of law and used for the purpose of enriching others?

Do you not suppose that that is calculated in the long run to create dissatisfaction and unrest? That is what has contributed largely to the present disturbed condition of our country. The most ardent admirers of the President, in the energy and courage he has displayed in his antitrust fights, are beginning to realize the glaring inconsistency that he has persistently committed of giving protection to these destructive tariff evils, through the tariff laws, and assailing them through the Sherman antitrust law and the Elkins Act. The President's friends claim that he has won imperishable laurels in bringing about the regulation of railroads, preventing unjust charges and rebates and discriminations. This is all well enough in its way, but what comparison is there in the amount of money that the railroads unlawfully exacted from the people of the country since the maximum rate decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, in unjust rates and rebates and discriminations, and the amount forced from the American people at the same time by many of the unjust schedules of the Dingley tariff. Yet, the President was as quiet and docile as may be when he was fully advised that only one of these mighty and trust-fattened enterprises—the steel trust—at the close of the fiscal year, the 30th of January, 1907, the net earnings of this one enterprise, favored by the tariff, were, $164,490,945, when more than $80,000,000 of its net earnings were due to the protection given by the Dingley tariff. This is but one item. All the rebates, discriminations, and unlawful charges of railroads for years past are insignificant as compared with these criminal extortions perpetrated on the people by the steel trust, and when you aggregate all of such trusts and the amount that each one takes in dollars and cents from the people, it would equal in value all the railroads—over 220,000 of mileage—in our whole country, aggregating a value of $15,000,000,000. It seems that a wrong of such magnitude ought to have invited the attention of the President.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to commend a particular paragraph of the President's message, on page 4 of the pamphlet, in which the President follows a good example established by Democrats. The President, in discussing the unlawful use and abuse of the process of injunction by Federal courts, says this drastic and harsh process has been used "under the guise of property rights unwarrantably to invade the fundamental rights of the individual." The President recommends to Congress to enact a statute "that reasonable notice should be given the adverse party." This is but a fundamental principle of justice, and without notice to the adverse party—which is of itself publicity—the recent proceedings, under the inspirations of the plaintiff's attorney, of some of the Federal judges at their private chambers would continue to be the source of wrong and injustice to the individual rights of weak and helpless citizens.

I recall that the Democrats lustily contended that this proviso should be inserted in the Hepburn railway rate law, "That no injunction, interlocutory order, or decree suspending or restraining the enforcement of an order of the Commission shall be granted, except on hearing, after not less than five days' notice to the Commission." This provision, in opposition to Democratic contention, was left out of the Hepburn rate law as it passed the House, but was inserted in the Senate. I hope the President's party will promptly, during this Congress, enact the President's suggestion into a statute.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to a paragraph in the President's message, on page 5.

He says:

> It is my purpose, as soon as may be, to submit some further recommendations in reference to our laws regulating labor conditions within the sphere of Federal authority.

The first paragraph in the President's message also relates to the relations of labor and capital.

Why is that brought up at this time? I can hardly say, because we are at the threshold of a great political campaign. It is common understanding that our labor organizations are not right now in love with the purposes of this Administration. Take the history of the Republican party on the subject of labor within the last six years. Why, it is a matter of record. In 1884 or 1885 the "Bureau of Labor" was created and put into the Interior Department. It stayed there a while, and then it was taken out of the Interior Department and made an independent Department, and remained such for many years. The only thing that it needed was to give it a secretary who should have a seat in the Cabinet of the President. The Democratic platform of 1900 had declared in strong terms, demanding that there should be created a Department of Labor, with a secretary in the Cabinet of the President. Did any man contend that the interest of labor was not important and vital enough to have this dignity and honor? But, sir, when we came to make the Department of Commerce and Labor, in the Fifty-seventh Congress, every Democrat on the floor of the House of Representatives stood firmly, as I recall it, against taking the independent Department of Labor and classing it as a bureau along with Fisheries and other bureaus in the Department of Commerce and Labor. Yet the Republicans did that. Why did they strip that independent Department of Labor of its prestige and its dignity? They say that they gave it the same facilities and powers as Commerce. I contend they did not. I say they struck it down, and it stands to-day classed along with Fish and Fisheries, Bureau of Standards, Steamboat Inspection Service, and other bureaus of that kind, in the Department of Commerce and Labor. Finally, when the full test came and it was put to the Republicans, there was a motion made to recommit the bill, with instructions, as follows:

> Resolved, That the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to report a bill or bills to the House to create and establish two separate Departments, a Department of Labor and a Department of Commerce, each of the same dignity as existing Departments, and each with a Secretary in the Cabinet of the President. (RECORD, January 6, 1903.)

That motion was made by a Democrat and the RECORD shows that every Republican who voted voted against it, and every Democrat who voted voted for it. For that reason I hope that when the President sends in another message, if he is so interested in labor, just before a Presidential election, he will have in that message a recommendation that a Department of Labor will be created, and that it have a Secretary in the Cabinet of the President. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why not? In the great and mighty strife in which labor has been engaged, what man can say that it would not have been better, instead of sending for Mitchell and other labor leaders, as the President did, to have had a Secretary of Labor sitting in the Cabinet and representing the great labor interests of the country?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have something further to say about the message of the President.

It will hardly be denied by anyone that the message that the President sent to Congress is in a "class" by itself and that it is in response to the criticisms that the newspapers have freely passed upon him and the policies of his Administration. Is it considered wise to notice such criticisms in this way? Many of the recommendations made by the President in his message, if carried out by his party at once would undoubtedly be of benefit to the country. Criticism in the proper spirit and couched in proper language ought always to be invited and welcomed by a public official, it matters not how exalted his position. It especially ought to be eminently respectful and courteous when directed at the President of the United States. If criticism is otherwise than courteous and respectful it loses all effect and is properly accepted by the public in the nature of personal abuse.

I think our distinguished minority leader pointed out clearly the portions of the message that Democrats could, and did, cheerfully indorse. The message undoubtedly seeks to make the control of the trusts the paramount issue in the present campaign by ignoring the tariff, "the father of the trusts." If the President is truly sincere in the vigor and zeal for the pouplar rights expressed in his message, or the protection of the individual rights of the citizens against the rapacity of the trusts, why did he not recommend to his party that a guaranty be given to every American citizen the right to buy at home the products of American-manufactured articles as cheap as these products are sold in foreign countries. If that was done our trust problem would be solved. The message is a strong plea for the continuance of the Republican party in power. It really makes no direct recommendation for the relief of the burdens of the people. It is, of course, highly sensational and stamped in every word and line with the extraordinary unique and startling personality of the President. No one can for a moment doubt that the President is an expert in the "game of politics." He is a writer of great force, and his command of the English language leaves him without a rival among the noted public men of our country. As a political stroke at this juncture of political affairs the message is a masterpiece. As a practical public document for the betterment of the country it is a "falsum fulmen." As the message of a statesman it will, in the sober thought of the country, be pronounced a failure.

The highest work of a statesman is to seek to pacify the unrest and dissatisfaction of the people, when it exists as it does now, not to arouse and inflame it. If evils exist that threaten the welfare of the people, statesmanship suggests to exterminate them by the strong arm of the law. Other Presidents have been fearfully criticised in the early days of our Republic, but they did not answer their critics in a fiery message to Congress. Washington, in a letter to Benjamin Harrison, said:

> If I were to be called upon to draw a picture of the times and of men from what I have seen and heard and in part know, I should in one word say that idleness, dissipation, and extravagance seems to have laid hold of most of them; that speculation, peculation, and an insatiable thirst for riches seems to have got the better of every other consideration and almost every order of men.

Jefferson wrote lugubriously to Nathaniel Bacon:

> Our Government is now taking so steady a course as to show by what road it will pass to destruction—to wit, by consolidation first, and then corruption, its necessary consequence.

And it was Andrew Jackson who said:

> The United States bank will yet sap the foundations of our liberty.

Yet our Republic still lives and flourishes, and it will continue to flourish just so long as the people retain the instinct and the capacity or the desire for self-government. Of course we need the work of the reformer and great good comes often from such labor, but there must be no "hysteria" in such work. It must and should be deliberate and not sensational. I believe that predatory wealth, predatory poverty, "swollen fortunes," and the "criminal rich," together with the trusts, are evil forces abroad in our land, and they ought to be and will be controlled by the law when the true and imperishable Democratic principle of "equal rights to all and special favors to none" is handed out as a "square deal" to all alike. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to have the opinion of the gentleman from Alabama, who is a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, as to how he considers the recommendation of the President with reference to a change in the Sherman antitrust law? Does the gentleman consider that the President recommends that it be so changed as to eliminate its application to railroad combinations?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes. I understand the recommendation of the President to correct that portion of the Sherman Act which prohibits railroads from making any combinations, good or bad.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, would not that practically put the railroads clear beyond any prohibitions in that statute?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that the recommendation made by the President, as I understand it, is to relieve the railroads of any application of the Sherman antitrust act, as I have already stated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then they would be turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission entirely?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No political party ought to stay in power so long as to believe that the Government belongs to that party. That is the condition of the Republican party to-day. The Democratic party never had a better chance to win than it has in the campaign now opening. The people are ready to turn the Republicans out. No man can fairly doubt that there are easily enough Democratic voters in the Union to elect at the polls next November our Democratic nominees, but we must unite these voters by the platform we make and the candidates we place on that platform. It behooves the leaders of our party to lay down broad and plain Democratic principles. Let us present tariff reform as a fundamental principle, and that the trusts are entirely dependent on the tariff. A victory won by the national Democracy on such an issue will be a victory on principle and merits and guarantee our control of the Government in the interests of the people for years to come. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, the protective-tariff system is not, as one might suppose from the many things that are said on this floor and throughout the country, a Republican contrivance. It is not even an American invention, though it was once erroneously caller "the American system." In this connection the etymology of the word "tariff" is not without some interest. Tariff was so called from the old town and castle of Tarifa, on the Straits of Gibraltar, where, during the seventh century of Mohammedan rule in Spain there lived a band of Moorish pirates who exacted tribute from every vessel entering or leaving the Mediterranean Sea. Nobody contended then that this system was anything but robbery. No one then contended—not even the pirates themselves—that it rested on any other foundation save that of the strong arm and the light purse. Far be it from me, Mr. Chairman, to even intimate that the beneficiaries of our present tariff system are robbers; unlike their Moorish predecessors, they operate under the forms of law, and while no man can dispute that they are strong of arm, none will venture to assert that they are light of purse. [Laughter and applause.]

In the earlier periods of our country's history there was little difference between parties or statesmen about the tariff question. All parties and all statesmen then conceded that import duties ought to be levied for the primary and principal purpose of raising revenue for the Government, and for the secondary and entirely incidental purpose of affording "encouragement and protection" to our infant industries, at that time struggling with powerful competition from older and stronger rivals in England and throughout Europe. No party and no statesman then contended that protection ought to be continued long after these interests were no longer infantile, but grown to giant size and strength. No party or statesman then advanced the doctrine that taxation was a blessing in disguise and that the more a people were taxed the richer they grew. It has remained for latter-day Republican statesmanship to advance these wonderful contentions. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, stranger than fiction, more marvelous than romance, has been the wonderful history of American industrial development. When this Government was established we were, commercially and industrially, the weakest of the weak. To-day we are the strongest of the strong. Then we were the poorest of the poor. Now we are the richest of the rich. Then we were almost entirely an agricultural people. Now we are not only the leading agricultural, but also the leading manufacturing nation of earth. In the production of all of the great food staples we are easily first. In the production of silver we lead the world. We are now second, and are rapidly advancing to the first place among the nations, in the production of gold. In the production of most of the great raw materials we lead the world.

As to pig iron and steel, I invite your attention to a table taken from our Census Report on Manufactures (1905):

[a] Cotton crop supplement to the Commercial and Financial Chronicle (New York), September, 1901.

Conditions for the development of our manufactures have been the most favorable on earth. Consider them for just a moment; first, the greatest and cheapest supply of raw material in the world at their very doors; second, the most intelligent and productive labor on earth literally swarming into their factories; third, heavy duties, highly protective, and in many cases prohibitory, barring foreign competition and pouring into their laps tremendous bounties from the pockets of all consumers.

Is it strange that, under these circumstances, our manufactures have contributed even more than their due proportion to the glorious advance of American industry to world primacy? Is it not reasonable to suppose that they should at least keep pace with the unprotected wheat grower of the West, and the bountyless cotton grower of the South in the general onward sweep of American progress? That they have more than done so is shown by the following table, taken from the Census Report of Manufactures, 1905:

TABLE CCXLV.—Per cent of increase in value of domestic exports, by groups, 1896 to 1905.

Group.	Per cent of increase.

Exports unmanufactured	54.8

Exports manufactured	87.4
Foodstuffs partly or wholly prepared	29.0
Manufactures for further use in manufacturing	174.7
Manufactures ready for consumption	121.2

[a] Decrease.

That they have not only outstripped other industries in this country, but also their rivals throughout the world, is shown from the table I next submit, taken from the same report, it being a reproduction of the figures of Mulhall, the eminent English statistician:

TABLE IV.—Manufactures in the United States and foreign countries.

United States	268	467	1,907	9,498
Total	5,912	8,808	13,386	26,850

To complete the picture I have attempted to draw, let me next submit a statement of our Census Bureau on this subject, made in 1905:

None of the great industrial nations have followed the example of the United States in attempting to measure at regular intervals the value of the manufactured products of the country, so that it is difficult to furnish figures that will indicate, by industries, the relative positions of the competing nations. It is possible, however, to obtain information which, although not official, is sufficiently reliable to supply the deficiency to some extent. Estimates published by eminent statisticians and the figures appearing annually in certain commercial papers are the principal sources of information.

In respect to the value of manufactures produced annually, the English statistician, Michael G. Mulhall, assigned the United States to fourth place in 1860, and conceded that it was first in 1894. A more recent authority, however, has expressed the belief that this lead was probably gained as early as 1885. According to the same authorities it is probable that the United Kingdom can claim second place, with Germany third, and France fourth. Germany has made greater relative progress during the past twenty-five years than either England or France, and now the products of German mills have supplanted English wares in many markets which Great Britain had previously monopolized. However, Germany has probably not yet reached the United Kingdom in the value of industrial production.

According to the English Board of Trade the exports of manufactured goods of the United Kingdom constituted from 17 to 20 per cent of the total industrial output of 1902, and upon this basis the value of manufactures of the United Kingdom for that year may be reckoned at about $4,588,630,000, or over $3,000,000,000 less than the net value of the manufactured products, exclusive of hand trades, of the United States in 1900, according to the census of manufactures. These figures give some indication of the supremacy that the United States has obtained in the industrial world.

Now, it would, I submit, be only reasonable to suppose and expect that our manufactures would no longer plead infancy at the bar of public opinion, and would no longer beg for protection from their ferocious foreign rivals.

But, alas, Mr. Chairman, vain is our hope, futile is our expectation. They seem to desire not only to hold fast to what they have, but also, poor industrial foundlings that they are, to continue to hold out their spoons for more of the public soup, for those of them who are not standing fast in the ranks of the "standpatters" insist that whatever tariff revision public sentiment may force shall in all cases be "along protective lines" and in many cases be upward instead of downward. More fortunate than Ponce de Leon, they seem to have discovered the fountain of eternal youth and to have plunged deep beneath its limpid waters. [Applause.]

Will they never learn the lesson taught by List, the great German protectionist? Let me invite your attention to what List said, as far back as 1841:

Finally, history teaches us how nations which have been endowed by nature with all resources which are requisite for the attainment of the highest grade of wealth and power may and must, without on that account forfeiting the end in view, modify their systems according to the measure of their own progress; in the first stage adopting free trade with more advanced nations as a means of raising themselves from a state of barbarism and of making advances in agriculture; in the second stage, promoting the growth of manufactures, fisheries, navigation, and foreign trade by means of commercial restrictions; and in the last stage, after reaching the highest degree of wealth and power, by gradually reverting to the principle of free trade and of unrestricted competition in the home as well as in foreign markets, that so their agriculturists, manufacturers, and merchants may be preserved from indolence and stimulated to retain the supremacy which they have acquired. (Chapter X.)

He adds that Great Britain alone appeared—in his time—to have reached this final stage.

Who can dispute the fact that the United States has now arrived at the third stage described by List, and that the policy he proclaims as the true one for that stage is now the true American policy—the real "American system?" [Applause.]

THE TIN-PLATE INDUSTRY.

It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to confine myself today to generalizations, however sound. I shall take up a particular manufacturing industry that has been in recent years created and sustained by our tariff laws, and by them alone. I shall undertake to trace the origin, growth, and present condition of the industry. I will endeavor to show the effect of our protective tariff system, both upon the industry itself and upon the consuming public in the United States. I have selected for my investigation an industry that is especially adapted to these purposes, one that is a conspicuous example of both the so-called "virtues" and the undeniable vices of the protective system. I refer to the tin-plate industry. Prior to the year 1890, and indeed for some years thereafter, practically all of the tin plate consumed in this country was imported from England. Swansea, Wales, is the principal seat of the industry, and in 1890 the Welsh practically supplied the world with tin plate. Under the tariff law of 1883 we imposed a duty of 1 cent per pound on it. This was strictly a duty for revenue purposes, as we produced none of the article. For a long number of years the price that people in the United States paid was the English price plus the cost of transportation plus the duty imposed by our Government.

The duty amounted, in round figures, to about $21 per ton (English).

The English price might rise or fall, in accordance with the laws of trade, of supply and demand of the article, of the scarcity or plenty of money, or the strength or weakness of competition, or improvement in processes of manufacture, or rise or fall in cost of raw material; but rise when it would, fall when it would, in obedience to those laws, the American price rose with it and fell with it, the cost of transportation and the American duty being added in each case, as true as the needle to the pole. Let me invite your attention to the following table of prices per ton, in England and in the United States, between the years 1888 and 1899, inclusive.[a] The figures are based on the English ton as the unit:

Year.	English price f.o.b. ship.	United States duty.	Price at New York.
1888	$68.85	$21.60	$91.20
1889	68.04	21.60	87.00
1890	73.00	21.60	95.00
1891	77.76	21.60 / 47.52 } $34.59	103.60
1892	65.61	47.52	97.20
1893	63.95	47.52	104.20
1894	59.33	47.52 / 26.00 } 46.76	83.83
1895	56.27	26.00	73.50
1896	55.26	26.00	70.00
1897	54.43	26.00	75.20
1898	53.11	32.40	82.00
1899	60.07	32.40	97.80

The English prices in the above table are taken from the British official report (House of Commons) on wholesale and retail prices, printed in 1903, page 35. The prices are reduced from English money to our equivalent. The American prices are those given by Mr. Reid to the Industrial Commission (the average price for each year being calculated) and can be found in volume 1 of the Reports of the Industrial Commission, page 869.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the table just given let me call your attention to several significant facts. In 1888, 1889, and in 1890 the New York price was the duty and cost of transportation and English price, all added together. Substantially that is the result, although it is not precisely that in that year. The increase of duty carried by the McKinley Act did not go into effect until July 1, 1891. For the first half of that year, the duty imposed by the act of 1883 was in effect; for the latter half the McKinley Act was in force. I have, therefore for that year calculated the duty on the basis of a mean between the two rates. I have also adopted that plan for 1894, when the Wilson Act passed. It will be observed, further, that up to 1897 whenever English prices rose American prices also rose, and vice versa, although not always exactly together. This is true with one exception. From 1897 to 1899, inclusive, however, the reverse is uniformly true. For while the English price fell from $54.43 in 1897 to $53.11 in 1898, the American price rose from $75.20 in 1897 to $82 in 1898. While the English price rose $6.94 per ton from 1898 to 1899, the American price rose $15.80 from 1898 to 1899. The latter fact is, I think, especially significant in view of the organization of the American Tin-Plate Company in December, 1898, a fact upon which I shall comment later. I can not carry this comparison of English and American prices further, year by year, because I have not been able as yet to obtain the figures in that precise form, but I do wish to submit to the House and to the country certain additional evidence as to comparative prices in England and in this country.

It must be recalled that the investigation of so-called "trusts" and industrial combinations by the Industrial Commission generally, and especially of this tin-plate trust, in October, 1899, had taken place. The control by these combinations of domestic prices had caused a legislative investigation and had aroused public sentiment. It appeared then almost certain that vigorous action for the enforcement of law and, if necessary, for the enactment of stronger and more efficient laws was imminent. Even the sacred Dingley schedules might be lowered, or even destroyed altogether, unless the rapacity of these combinations was restrained by some temporary self-denial, at least. Still the Reports of the British Board of Trade in 1904 show this (vol. 1, p. 132, and vol. 2, p. 570): That in 1900 and 1901 the New York price was kept $37 per ton higher than the English price; that in 1902 it was kept $31 higher, and in 1903 it was kept $25 a ton higher. In 1904, according to the testimony of witness No. 14 (name not disclosed), delivered before the British tariff commission of 1904 (par. 858), the American price was 7d. per box or £7 per ton or $35 per ton higher than the English price; in other words, as the witness says, "the American price is kept equal to our price plus the duty." That the same thing is true to-day I do not hesitate to assert, in view of the proof I have already submitted.

The Republican party can never hope to make good its contention, so often made, that the price of tin plate has not been enormously increased by the McKinley and Dingley acts. It can not make good that contention by showing that since the Dingley Act went into effect the price of tin plate and of articles manufactured from it has decreased. We reply that the price has decreased not on account of the tariff, but despite it; that the real test is a comparison of prices in this country where there is a heavy duty and in England where there is no duty.

If they "point with pride," as they do in all their campaign speeches and campaign books, to the 5-cent dinner pail of the American workingman, and say that it is cheaper than ever before, our rejoinder is that the British workingman buys the same pail for three cents. [Loud applause.]

By the way, we venture to inquire, Is that famous pail still full? If so, is it full of panic soup? Does the rule still hold good, so often asserted by Republicans, that a high tariff causes prosperity and a low tariff panics? I pause for a reply. [Laughter and applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, let us now consider briefly the progress of the industry. In 1890 we imported from England, in round numbers, 300,000 tons of tin plate. We produced none. When the McKinley Act passed this industry could not, of course, spring into immediate and full-grown existence in response to the high duties imposed on the foreign product. It required time to establish and put in operation plants and factories. So substantial was the encouragement to do so, however, that as little time as possible was lost in going about it. By 1893 the imports had fallen from 330,000 tons to 215,000 tons, a decrease of 115,000 tons. During the same three-year period the domestic production has risen from nothing to 55,000 tons. By 1898 the foreign importations had sunk to 67,000 tons, and domestic production had increased to 327,000 tons. The Republicans triumphantly exclaimed: "Here is the product of our statesmanship, sprung full-grown, like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter, from the loins of protection; we have created an industry where there was none; we have given employment to thousands of American workingmen who had none, and at the same time have actually lowered the price of tin plate and of the manufactures thereof!"

I think I have already exposed the fallacy of the last part of this claim. So far as the claim of aiding the workingman by this procedure is concerned, I will undertake to dispose of it in another part of this argument. Let me, however, in this immediate connection, say that every dollar that was paid under this system of "forcing an industry" to the comparatively few workingmen engaged in the manufacture of tin plate was wrung from the blood and sweat of millions of workingmen all over this country, in factory and on farm, in the store and in countinghouse, in every branch of industry and commerce, by reason of the higher prices that all had to pay for articles manufactured from tin plate; prices that although lower because of cheaper steel plate and improvement in processes of manufacture than they had been in this country before the increase in duty, were yet kept higher here by that increase in duty than prices were in other lands. [Applause.]

But to return to the progress of this industry. By 1898 it was established. It was full grown. It was supplying practically all of the domestic demand. The domestic price had been raised as much above the foreign price as the duty was. The time had apparently come when the product of protection incubation could at least toddle alone. We were producing in this country three-fourths as much tin as England was producing. The period had arrived, so often and so eloquently eulogized by Henry Clay and by every protectionist from his day to this, when domestic competition would relieve the long-suffering consumer and operate to lower the price. What happened? A Chicago lawyer and "promoter" named Moore—Judge William H. Moore—went down to Pittsburg, the "American Swansea" of tin-plate industry. In the South there is an old saying, "As smart as a Philadelphia lawyer," but anyone who will take the trouble to read the marvelous story of "Judge" Moore's operations as detailed by him to the Industrial Commission on October 17, 1899, will readily concede that this saying of ours ought to be changed. It ought to be hereafter "As smart as a Chicago lawyer." [Laughter and applause.]

Why did Moore go down to Pittsburg? He had already at that time "organized" the National Steel Company, spelled with an "e;" the American Steel Hoop Company, the National Biscuit Company, the Diamond Match Company, the Union Bag and Paper Company, and two others; in fact, he was an expert "organizer," for he says himself that besides these he "had had applications to organize hundreds of others from the marshes of Maine to the Pacific coast." A "committee of manufacturers" had "urgently requested" him to "take hold of the organization" of the tin-plate industry. Ungrateful manufacturers! The special and peculiar product of a system that promised relief to domestic consumers by domestic competition, they were hardly able to toddle before they were anxious to organize so as to defeat the promised competition! How did Moore set about the accomplishment of his organization? He secured options, to be discharged in cash or stock of the new company he proposed to organize, at the choice of the owners, upon twenty-seven out of the thirty-three of the mills engaged in the product of tin plate and producing 90 per cent of the entire product of this country. I get these figures from the testimony of Mr. Daniel G. Reid, president of the company that Moore organized, delivered before the Commission on October 17, 1897.

What amount of cash did Moore agree to pay on these option contracts? To use his own words, "four and a half or five millions." With a high financier like the "Judge" accuracy is not only approximated, but attained, when he can come within half a million or so of the amount he had agreed to pay. How much cash did Judge Moore really pay when he organized the company? None. He paid the owners of the twenty-seven mills stock in the new company, reserving to himself ten millions of the stock for the "cost of promotion and organization." What was the real value of the properties Moore combined? He said not over five millions; possibly not over four and a half. It could not have been more than that, for by 1900, according to the census reports, the total capital in the United States engaged in the tin-plate business was about $6,000,000.

On this real valuation of not exceeding four and a half million dollars Judge Moore organized and chartered, in December, 1898, "the American Tin Plate Company," with an authorized capital of $50,000,000, $20,000,000 preferred and $30,000,000 common stock. Of the authorized capital stock $18,000,000 of the preferred stock and $28,000,000 of the common stock was actually issued, a total of $46,000,000 of capital stock. He took out the charter in the State of New Jersey, because, as he explained, "the New Jersey law is very much better for the organization of these companies; very much better." [Laughter.]

Now, although it seems to me that proof on the subject is hardly necessary, as the purpose of the "organization" is perfectly obvious, still I will offer some from the reports of the Industrial Commission. Mr. Jenks, of the Commission, asked Mr. Reid, president of the American Tin Plate Company, this question:

At the time when the American Tin Plate Company was organized, was it the presumption that if the tin plate company were organized the business would be a fairly profitable one? Were times good enough so that it seemed that the business would be a profitable one if they could get this organization through?

To that question Mr. Reid replied:

It seems so; yes. It seemed that there would be a great deal more money in the business than there had been in the past; that there would be no cutting of prices, cutting down to a losing basis.

Again, Mr. Reid admitted, in response to a question from Mr. Jenks:

It (referring to the organization of the American Tin Plate Company) was for the purpose of getting together to do away with the foolishness in making prices, and competition, I suppose, would enter into that.

Mr. William Griffiths, of Washington, Pa., an independent tin-plate manufacturer, testified that at the time this combination was formed (1898) he was making 25 per cent profit on his investment, although the prices were the lowest that had ever been, and that the purpose of the combination was to put up prices and increase the profits. He also said that prices might be lowered "if there was a change in the tariff." Mr. William Going, an independent manufacturer of Baltimore, Md., but evidently affiliated with the trust, was asked these questions by Mr. Jenks, of the Commission:

From the experience you have had with these combinations in Baltimore, what is your own opinion of that matter? Is there any special saving by combination, or did you simply make your profits of 100 per cent or less from the added ability that you had to put prices up on the consumer?

To this question Mr. Going replied:

Our idea was that by consolidation we could stop the competition.

Mr. Wm. Greer, of Newcastle, Pa., one of the district managers of the American Tin Plate Company, said:

After having considered the then condition of the tin-plate industry for some considerable time prior to the purchase of the individual mills by the American Tin Plate Company we concluded that it would be better for us, as stockholders of the individual mills, that all should become partners, each with the other. By doing this we hoped to stop the intense "cut-throat" competition, etc.

But, Mr. Chairman, why continue to pile up evidence to prove so patent a fact? The purpose of this "combination" has not only been patent always, but has been boldly and impudently admitted. This combination controlled 90 per cent of the entire American product of tin plate; it was in open, shameful, and notorious violation of the Sherman antitrust act, and yet what effort has been made during all these ten years of Republican power to vindicate the outraged law, trampled under foot so brazenly in this case? None.

Another feature of this scandalous performance ought not, Mr. Chairman, to be overlooked by the American people. "Judge" Moore New Jerseyized five millions of real value into forty-six millions of watered stock. From that day to this a 7 per cent dividend has been paid on eighteen millions of preferred stock, thirteen millions of which is nothing on earth but water—a dividend rendered possible because the trust is so strong that it controls the domestic price absolutely and is sheltered behind a tariff wall $32 a ton high.

An ordinary person would suppose, Mr. Chairman, that "combination" and "organization" had reached its climax in this tin-plate business. But, sir, the American "promoter" is no ordinary person. After Moore finished his work in December, 1898, and looked back upon it in October, 1899, and pronounced it good, only two or three years elapsed before, in April, 1901, the whale that had been called the American Tin Plate Company was, in turn, swallowed by that billion-dollar whale called the United States Steel Corporation, a corporation also unwhipped of justice, and as one of the "constituent companies" of that monster organization it continues to levy a tax on American consumption of more than 40 per cent ad valorem on an annual production of more than $30,000,000 in value behind the sheltering battlements of the Dingley tariff. Twelve millions a year, sir, or $120,000,000, is a moderate estimate of what the Dingley tariff has poured into the coffers of the tin-plate trust since that wintry day in December, 1898, when, under the skillful and yet tender ministrations of "Judge" Moore, of Chicago, it first saw the New Jersey light.

THE TARIFF, THE TRUSTS, AND THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. Chairman, the industry to which I have made particular reference to-day does not present an unusual condition or a peculiar situation. The highly protective, and in many cases prohibitive, rates and schedules of the Dingley tariff have invited our manufacturers to combination and consolidation; an invitation, sir, that they have been neither slow nor bashful about accepting. In his book, entitled "The Truth About the Trusts" (1904), Mr. John Moody gives a list of 7 great industrial trusts and 298 lesser industrial trusts. They have a combined capitalization of seven thousand two hundred and forty-six millions of dollars. They control a great percentage of the total domestic production, and in almost every case are strong enough to fix the home price, putting down competition with an iron hand and by the use of indefensible methods. With the home market secured by an impassable tariff wall, they have turned their attention to spectacular foreign campaigns, and are selling wire fencing to the farmers of South America cheaper than they will sell it to the farmers of Georgia. They deliver steel rail to the Joppa and Jerusalem Railroad cheaper than they will deliver it to our American railroads. They sell sewing machines to the women of London and Paris cheaper than they will sell them to the women of New York and Chicago. Our country is plastered with them from the Lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean. They have cornered every market and controlled every industry. They greet the newborn infant as he sleeps in a trust-made cradle; they attend him through every stage of life, and when at last he dies he sleeps in a trust-made coffin. [Applause.]

Huge corporations spring up overnight, like Jonah's gourd, and present to the world the most dazzling, bewildering, and stupendous array of stocks and bonds that it has ever beheld. Tariff privileges and governmental favor are capitalized, water is poured in with unstinted hand, and the consuming, purchasing, long-suffering public is asked to pay dividends on the whole. Overtrading, debt loading, and wild speculation have been indulged in to an extent that the world never witnessed before; to an extent of which poor, much-abused John Law never even dreamed. The period of reaction has naturally come. Investors have begun to wonder how much of this capital is real and how much is fictitious. The President has tired of the "stand-pat" policy, bequeathed to him by Mark Hanna, and gives some evidence of a purpose to vindicate the outraged statutes. Values dropped still lower, and a panic came; a panic with cotton at 12 cents a pound, with wheat at a dollar a bushel, and with the Dingley tariff still in force! [Applause.] President Roosevelt is bitterly denounced as the panic maker and as bitterly denies it, replying to his accusers in the most remarkable message that any American President ever sent to a Congress. In his so-called "campaign against privilege," as far as it goes, and in so far as it is a real battle, instead of a sham battle, the Democratic party sympathizes most earnestly with Mr. Roosevelt and supports him most loyally. But we will be no party to a sham battle. If the knife is to be applied to the cancer, and we agree that it ought, let us cut to the cancer's heart and not merely operate around its edges. [Applause.] Why confine the treatment to the sores that are caused by impure blood? The protective tariff is the impure blood from which the trust sores have sprung. Why not purify the blood instead of being content with doing nothing but cutting out the sores, only to see them return in more aggravated form? [Applause.]

The President can never hope to appeal to thoughtful Americans as a real opponent of monopoly so long as he continues to support a tariff system from which monopoly springs as naturally and as certainly as death springs from incurable disease. [Applause.]

So long as he fights monopoly with his left hand and supports its chiefest pillar and prop with his right hand thoughtful observers can not credit a man of his splendid mentality with complete sincerity or with entire intellectual honesty.

Mr. Chairman, on this immediate point—the connection between the tariff and the trusts—I will print as a part of my remarks and at their conclusion, a very able address that was delivered on October 25, 1907, by Mr. Byron W. Holt, of the New York Reform Club, before the recent national conference on trusts and combinations held at Chicago, Ill.

PRICES.

During the course of these remarks I have already adverted to the contention that has always been made by protectionists—whether they were Whigs or Republicans—that a protective tariff would stimulate domestic production and, consequently, increase domestic competition, thereby finally removing the burden at first imposed on the consumer. I have already attempted to show how this theory has come to grief in this country, perishing at the hands of "industrial combinations." But our Republican friends have an inveterate habit of contending that prices have not been raised by high tariff duties, and they have employed great floods of eloquence, tons of campaign literature, and innumerable statistics to establish their contention on this point. But they never undertake—because they dare not—a comparison of prices of similar articles or of prices generally between this country and a country where there is no protective tariff. They might multiply figures and pile up statistics from now until doomsday, but so long as they confine themselves to a comparison of the prices during different years in this country alone it amounts to nothing and signifies nothing. The rise and fall of prices is determined the world over by a multitude of considerations besides tariff duties.

The abundance or scarcity of money, the relative supply of and demand for a given article, the fierceness or the weakness of domestic competition, labor cost, improvement in processes of manufacture, cheap or dear raw material, are all highly important factors in the make-up of prices that must follow the inexorable laws of trade. For any, or all, of these reasons high prices might follow a low tariff, or low prices might follow a high tariff. But these laws of trade are world-wide in their application and affect all countries. Therefore the only true test of the effect of tariff duties upon prices is a comparison of prices in the "protected" country with prices in some "unprotected" country of something like the same advancement and standard of civilization. In our own case, the real test comes when American prices under our protective-tariff system are compared with prices in Great Britain, where there is no protective-tariff system. I have already shown you in the tin-plate industry that English prices are much lower than our prices. Now, let me make one or two more comparisons of that kind. From 1897, the year the Dingley tariff was enacted, to 1904, the last year that I have been able to get the official British reports from our Library, or from any source at my command, the price of clothing rose in Great Britain 4.2 per cent. As authority for that statement I refer you to the Trade Reports of the British Board of Trade, volume 2, page 53.

During the same period, from 1897 to 1904, the price of clothing rose in this country 20.6 per cent. My authority for this statement is Bulletin No. 69, Bureau of Labor (March, 1907), pages 250–251. In other words, from 1897 to 1907 clothing rose in price almost five times as rapidly in this country as it did in Great Britain. [Applause.]

Again, according to the figures given by Mr. Holt, in his admirable address that I shall print, English prices rose 35 per cent from July, 1896, to March, 1907, and during that same period American prices rose 55 per cent. [Applause.]

As Mr. Holt well says, the English appreciation of 35 per cent is the world-wide appreciation, due to the increased quantity and decreased price of gold during this period. But the American advance of 20 per cent more than the British advance is due, in large part at least, to the heavy burdens imposed on the American consumer by the higher rates of the Dingley law. [Applause.]

WAGES.

But, Mr. Chairman, the defenders of protection, although they use every effort to convince the domestic consumer that the tariff duties have not and will not increase the prices that he must pay for what he buys, are brazenly inconsistent when they appeal to the wage-earner engaged in the manufacturing industries. They tell him that but for protection he must face the competition of the "pauper labor" of Europe and Asia, and that because of the protective duties his employer is able to pay him a higher wage. How is the employer able to pay a higher wage by the tariff, I would inquire, unless it be true that the tariff enables the employer to get a higher price in the home market for his goods? So it clearly appears, when we closely consider the argument that protectionist makes to the consumer on the one hand and to the wage-earner in the factory on the other, how entirely inconsistent and discordant are the arguments advanced in support of the system. It is, I think, necessary for us to examine the higher-wage argument, for I believe that upon it alone the Republican party won its last tariff victory, the election of 1888.

In the first place, I take issue, on high moral ground, with the soundness of the very essence of the doctrine, even if the truth of the contention be conceded for the purpose of the argument, though, as a matter of fact, I do not concede it, but most emphatically dispute it.

The doctrine that by law, by special privilege, by governmental favor, this Government ought to give to any class of capitalists or laborers a special bounty that must be paid out of the pockets of all the people is paternalistic to its very marrow and socialistic to the very last degree. The wage-earner who works in a factory is no more entitled to it than the wage-earner who works on the farm. [Applause.] The manufacturer or his employee is no more entitled to a bounty than the cotton planter or the wheat grower or the cattle raiser. It is not a correct principle of government to build up a few industries at the expense of many, or a few classes of laborers at the expense of all. If a combination can be made of special interests that are so favored that is strong enough to carry the elections, it may for a time succeed, but its success can never be enduring, because it is based on principles that are un-Democratic, un-Republican, and un-American; principles against which our fathers fought in 1776; principles that are completely antagonistic to the very genius of this Government, which was founded to bestow upon all men equality in opportunity and rights. [Applause.] But our Republican friends contend that the figures and statistics show that high tariffs in general, and the Dingley tariff in particular, have resulted in an increase in the wage of the American laboring man, particularly in manufacturing industries, and in support of this proposition, upon which they have now come to mainly rely, they grow vehemently eloquent and learnedly statistical.

Let me say here that the price paid for labor, just like the price paid for anything else, depends upon innumerable considerations besides the tariff laws, and usually entirely disassociated from them. Among those considerations that are highly important factors in determining the scale of wages might be mentioned the supply of labor and the demand for it, the efficiency or nonefficiency of the labor itself, the plenty or scarcity of money. But the Republican rejoinder to this argument is that American labor is the best paid labor on earth, and here they invite instead of shun foreign comparison. We, on our side, frankly concede that in nominal money wages American labor is the best paid on earth, but we say in reply to that:

1. High tariff duties did not cause the difference. Before the Government of the United States was established, before we had any tariff, Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations called attention to the fact that American wages were twice as high as English wages, and one of the reasons advanced by Alexander Hamilton in his Report on Manufactures, in 1791, for the establishment of the protective-tariff system was that wages in this country were much higher than they were in Europe. To-day, with all the "protection" afforded by your McKinley law and your Dingley law, American wages are not as much higher than English wages as they were in Adam Smith's day. The difference in 1904 was that wages in New York were 79 per cent higher than money wages in London, and wages in the United States outside of New York City were 93 per cent higher than wages in Great Britain otuside of London according to the Report of the British Board of Trade.

Further, if a high tariff makes for high wages and a low tariff for low wages, why is it that in Germany, a most highly "protected" country, wages are much lower than in England where there is no "protection?" Why is it that the English "unprotected" wage is vastly higher that the French protected wage? And yet if we may believe the official figures given by the British Board of Trade in 1904 (vol. 1, p. 289), if 100 shillings be taken as the average wage paid to the English workingman in London, for the same work the French workingman in Paris only gets 86 shillings and the German workingman in Berlin only gets 57 shillings. Again, if 100 shillings be taken as the average wage received by the British laborer outside of London, then the French laborer outside of Paris only gets 63 shillings and the German laborer outside of Berlin only gets 63 shillings. So it seems that the protective tariff does not give the German laborer or the French laborer any advantage in wages over the British laborer, who has no protective tariff.

Again, on page 275 of the same volume of the Reports of the British Board of Trade, a most interesting table is given, showing the rise of wages in each of the principal commercial countries between 1881 and 1900. From this table it appears that the following has been the rate of increase in each of the countries named between those years:

	Per cent increase.
Great Britain	20.3
Germany	22.8
France	17.6
Italy	16.2
United States	13.4

From this table—and I do not apprehend that either its fairness or its accuracy can be successfully questioned, for it is both impartial and official—it would seem that in the matter of money wages our American wage-earner, even with the alleged aid of the McKinley and Dingley bills, has not advanced upward as rapidly as his brother in Germany, in Great Britain, in France, or even in poverty-stricken Italy. [Applause.]

In the next place, Mr. Chairman, we reply that the tariff has been a positive disadvantage to the American wage-earner, for it has increased the cost of living to him at much more rapid rate than his wages have risen. The figures that I have already given on the rise of prices show an increase of 55 per cent since 1897. During that same period wages have not risen but 19.2 per cent, even according to the high estimate given by the Bureau of Labor in Bulletin No. 79, page 7 (March, 1907). What folly for the workingman to believe that the Republican party, or any other party that undertakes to create industries and fix values by law, will not take more from him with the left hand in the shape of increased prices for what he must buy than it will or can give to him with the right hand in the shape of tariff protection and increased wages for his labor.

In the third place, we reply that the American laborer does not get the highest wages on earth because of tariff favoritism, but because he earns it and is entitled to it by reason of his greater efficiency and larger productive power. Although the most highly paid nominally, yet when its productiveness and the labor cost to the employer is considered, American labor is the cheapest on earth. [Applause.]

In this connection let me call your attention to a part of the Report of the British Board of Trade on this subject (1904, vol. 1, p. 286):

At the outset it should be understood that the problem of comparing the average level of wages of the different countries is a very difficult and complex one, not only because of the defects of the data, but also because of the essential ambiguity of the problem itself.

1. We may approach the question of comparative wages from two entirely different points of view, leading to divergent, and, sometimes, even to opposite conclusions. We may either seek to compare the material well-being of the wage-earners or the wages cost of a given amount of work.

From the former point of view, we are mainly interested in the average money income of the wage-earning population, modified, of course, by differences in cost of living, but irrespective of differences in the efficiency of labor. If a bricklayer in France earns half the wages of a bricklayer in America, we should say his money wages were half as great, although, conceivably, the American might lay so many more bricks per hour that his labor might be even cheaper to his employer.

From the second point of view we are interested, not in the weekly income of the laborer, but in his wages regarded as an item in the cost of production, i. e., the wages cost of hewing a ton of coal, spinning a pound of yarn, or laying a hundred bricks, of course under identical conditions.

How entirely divergent are the above two methods of comparison will be realized from the fact that competent American economists are of the opinion that in the United States the average "labor cost" of a given volume of production is at least as low in Europe, if not lower, while the average income of the working classes is certainly higher in America than in any European country. However this may be, it is clear that the real cost of labor varies much less from country to country than the level of weekly wages or of yearly earnings, and that a high labor cost is compatible with low wages, and vice versa, owing to the variations in the efficiency of labor.

I invite your attention also to the following statement as to the relative productive capacity of the British and American laborer, from our Census Report on Manufactures (1902), part 1, page lxi:

He (Mulhall) estimated £107, or about $500, for Great Britain in 1894 and £270, or about $1,300, for the United States, the latter being nearly three times the English average. In 1900, the census shows an average product per wage-earner of $2,450, nearly five times Mr. Mulhall's estimate for Great Britain.

Mr. Chairman, whatever proportion of the wealth created by the union of capital and labor falls to the American wage-earner comes to him by reason of no tariff favoritism, of no Republican bounty. [Applause.] It comes to him, whether it be great or small, a fair or an unfair proportion of the wealth he has helped to create, as the reward of his sweat and toil, of his brain and brawn. He never gets more than his fair share, oftener he gets less, and to teach him that for what he does get he ought to be largely thankful to the Republican party and to the Dingley tariff is so monstrous a heresy that I have often wondered if any sensible, thoughtful, American workingman could really be deceived by it. It is a heresy, unfounded in truth, insulting to his manhood, and destructive to his self-respect.

The American workingman leads the world, sir, to-day, just as he has done for more than one hundred years, in efficiency and productive capacity. He is in no sense an object of charity and in no way requires a governmental subsidy to enable him to make his living. "In the sweat of his brow" doth he "eat bread," and for that bread he is beholden to no tariff, to no political party.

Mr. Chairman, now that the party in power has decided that it will follow the Roosevelt doctrine and "revise the tariff after the election," instead of the Cannon doctrine that it ought to be revised when we no longer have prosperity, many thoughtless persons are exclaiming that there will be no great difference between the parties on this great question; that both will be "for tariff revision." Ah, sir, but what kind of revision?

In deference to an ever-growing, not-to-be-denied public sentiment the Republican party will promise tariff revision; but tariff revision, if we may believe the general chorus their leaders are all shouting, along strictly protective lines.

The tariff revision for which the Democratic party will stand is, so far as I may venture to speak for it, a very different kind of revision. A revision, not in the interest of the protected classes and of the mighty monopolies, but a revision in the interest of the great body of the people, the consumers of this land; a revision along the lines laid down by the brilliant Robert J. Walker; a revision by wiping from the statute books that conglomerate mass of class legislation known as the "Dingley law," and substituting therefor a tariff for revenue only, levied upon the luxuries rather than the necessities of life.

If this issue between the parties be clearly and distinctly raised, so clearly and distinctly that there can be no hair-splitting about the meaning of words and phrases, so clearly and distinctly that the two opposite systems will stand out against one another in bold and startling relief, and the people can choose between the two, I am absolutely confident of Democratic success next November. [Applause.] On such an issue the party can and will win; far better, sir, it will deserve to win. [Long applause on the Democratic side.]

APPENDIX.

Address of Mr. Byron W. Holt, of the Reform Club, at the National Conference on Trusts and Combinations, at Chicago, Ill., October 22–25, 1907.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Is the tariff the mother of trusts? No; monopoly is. Is the tariff a mother of trusts? Yes; a most prolific mother. Besides, it is a foster mother of nearly all of the trusts of which it is not the real mother. The home-market monopoly, created by our present outrageously high Dingley tariff, has clearly given birth to and nourished and protected more vicious and monstrous trusts than have all other forms of monopoly in this country. The world never before saw so many huge, thieving, preying combinations as are now with us.

The arguments and evidence in support of these statements are so strong and overwhelming that it ought not to be necessary to repeat them to an intelligent audience. I shall briefly enumerate some of them:

PROTECTION INVITES TRUSTS.

1. A protective tariff tends to restrict competition to the country protected. It stands to reason that it is easier to form a national than an international, or world, trust.

2. Protected countries have many trusts; free-trade countries virtually none.

3. The number, size, and effectiveness of trusts in different countries varies, roughly, with the amount of protection afforded by tariff duties.

4. The era of trusts began in this country with the passage of the Dingley bill—the culmination of protection run mad.

5. No trust of consequence was formed under the relatively low protective tariff act called the "Wilson bill."

The first proposition is axiomatic. It is clear that a tariff which keeps out foreign goods, and thus restricts the field of competition, not only invites, encourages, and promotes the formation of industrial combinations, but fosters and protects them, after they are formed, and aids them in controlling prices. The smaller the territory circumscribed by a tariff wall the more likely it is that the competitors in an industry, inside this wall, will get together to control production and prices, within the wall, however free they leave themselves to cut prices in outside territory.

Fortunately for us, we do not have tariff walls around States, counties, or cities. The rates of duty of the Dingley bill would be unbearable and would not be tolerated by the most patient people on earth, if applied to a very small country or to a single State. Under such conditions our States would be overrun with trusts even more than they now are, and the sum total of the tariff graft, instead of being $1,500,000,000 a year, as now, would be two or three times as much. However, this country would not have attained its present great population and wealth had each of our States been surrounded by Dingley tariff walls. Its prosperity is largely due to the fact that, considering its internal commerce, it is the greatest free-trade country on earth.

The second and third propositions are based on facts. Unquestionably there are more and stronger trusts in protected than in free-trade countries; in countries of high than in those of moderate protective duties.

Congressman LITTLEFIELD, of Maine, a stanch Republican and protectionist, published, in 1903, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a list of 793 trusts with a total capitalization of $14,000,000,000. Of these trusts 435, with over $9,000,000,000 of capital, were industrial combinations. Nothing like this number of trusts has ever been found in any other country.

BUT FEW TRUSTS IN ENGLAND.

The Industrial Commission, a Republican partisan protectionist body of the most pronounced type, sent Prof. J. W. Jenks to Europe to find as many trusts there as possible. He found 35 so-called "trusts" in England, with a total capital of $460,000,000, or less than one-third that of our pet steel trust. He quoted tables from Liefman's book showing that there had been 345 trusts in Germany, and that from 230 to 250 were in existence there in 1897. He stated that "in England the movement toward combination has not gone so far as in either Austria or Germany"—both highly protected countries. He stated that the English trusts have but little water in their capitalization as compared with American trusts; that the English trusts have had little or no effect in advancing prices, and that the (then) recent slight advance in prices was "due in good part to the increase in the prices of the raw materials." In Germany he found that many of the trusts, taking advantage of the high tariff duties, had advanced prices very much. This was particularly true of the iron and steel trusts and of the sugar trust, or cartel, both of which pattern after our much larger trusts and sell goods for export much below the home prices.

Other writers find even fewer trusts in England than did Professor Jenks. Mr. Wilhelm Berdrow, a German economist, says in the May, 1899, Forum:

"As far as England is concerned, it must be admitted that the trust system has as yet found but tardy acceptance in that country. This is doubtless due in some degree to the thorough appreciation of the principle of free trade; for it is well known that the largest trusts are powerless unless their interests are secured by a protective tariff excluding from the whole market the product of foreign countries."

Mr. Thomas Scanlon, of Liverpool, writing of trusts in England, said: "It can not be said that we suffer in any appreciable degree from combinations of producers to keep up prices."

These and other authorities virtually agree that, instead of the price-raising, Congress-controlling, law-defying, bulldozing, and all-powerful tariff monsters with which we are familiar in this country, the so-called "trusts" of England are really only harmless syndicates, with little or no control over prices. They exist not because they have any monopoly, but because production can be carried on more economically on a large than on a small scale. If they attempt to control prices, as did the recently formed soap trust, they commit what, in England, is regarded as the unpardonable sin. The soap trust endured but a few short weeks. A really free people would not stand, for one month, the robbery of any one of our scores of plundering tariff trusts.

The testimony is overwhelming that trusts do not flourish in free-trade England as they do in protected Austria, Germany, and the United States. Nowhere, outside of the Republican Campaign Book and of the organs of protection, published by the organizations supported by the protected interests, is it even pretended that England has trusts comparable to those in this country. These organs brazenly disregard and defy all known facts. Thus the Republican Text-Book of 1900 said:

"England has no tariff, and trusts exist and flourish in free-trade England—trusts more monstrous than any that we know anything about."

These monstrous trusts, it was said, "are solely, thoroughly, and absolutely the product of the Cobdenite free trade."

The American Economist, organ of the Protective Tariff League, on October 18, 1907, says:

"Former Governor Douglas says the only way to save this country from the trusts is to cut down the tariff. Douglas would have a terrible time telling the British people how they were to get out of the clutches of the trusts. They are in the clutches more than the people of the United States, and they have no tariff to cut down."

I hesitate to say that the writers of these statements knew them to be false and that they deliberately distort and falsify facts and figures in order to deceive the voters and to prolong our accursed tariff system. I prefer to credit such misrepresentations to the overzealous efforts of protection fanatics who honestly believe that foreign trade and commerce is a curse and who would like to see each country surrounded by walls of fire.

DINGLEY BILL USHERED IN ERA OF TRUSTS.

While the truth of proposition four is well established by facts, it is also true that a few of our important trusts were formed under the auspices of the McKinley bill of 1890; three or four even antedating 1890.

Census Bulletin No. 22, issued, I believe, in 1900, contained information concerning 183 "industrial combinations," as they were modestly called, with a total authorized capital of $3,607,539,200. Of these 183 trusts, 7 were formed in 1897, 20 in 1898, 79 in 1899, and 13 in 1900 prior to June 30. Nearly two-thirds of these trusts were, therefore, formed in the three years following the passage of the Dingley Act.

Mr. John Moody's The Truth About the Trusts was published in March, 1904. It contains a list of 318 important active industrial trusts with a total outstanding capital of $7,246,342,533. Of these 318 trusts, 236, with a capitalization of $6,049,618,223, were formed since January, 1898. It thus appears that about three-fourths of the important trusts in 1904 were formed since the passage of the Dingley bill and that the capitalization of these trusts was more than five-sixths of the total capitalization of all trusts.

NO IMPORTANT TRUSTS UNDER WILSON BILL.

Only fourteen of these trusts were formed while the Wilson bill was in force. Of these fourteen, two were formed before and were only reorganized during the Wilson bill period. One, the Borax Consolidated (Limited), was incorporated in England, and was the outgrowth of a most obnoxious American trust, born in 1890, I believe. Another, the Consolidated Lake Superior Company, was named in 1897, but did not really become a trust until 1901. There were, then, really but ten trusts, with a total capital of only $108,150,000, that can properly be credited to the Wilson bill period. Of these ten trusts The Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, capitalized at $57,000,000, has since been reorganized. The remaining nine, having a capitalization of only $51,150,000, include several patent combinations and the Pure Oil Company, one of the most successful competitors of the Standard Oil Company.

The Wilson bill, then, was not the mother of a single successful trust of any consequence. This is a rather remarkable fact when it is considered that the Wilson bill rates were only slightly lower than those of the McKinley and Dingley bills. Its duties were, however, much less protective than those of the other bills. From these facts we may infer that moderate protection will not give birth to many important trusts and that inordinate protection is necessary to overcome the natural tendency of individual manufacturers to hang on to the businesses which they have built up. These facts are also suggestive to some of our mighty statesmen who are vainly trying to "bust" trusts by court proceedings, and without taking away from them the special tariff privilege which nourishes and sustains them. It is as if our nation should try to prevent drunkenness and its many evils by legislative enactments, while maintaining public saloons for the free distribution of whisky and other alcoholic drinks.

It being, then, established that our Dingley tariff breeds trusts as naturally as a tropical swamp breeds mosquitoes, we are ready to consider another phase of the tariff-trust question.

TARIFFS, TRUSTS, AND PRICES.

Not only did the Dingley Act usher in an era of trusts, but it also ushered in an era of high prices. Professedly, a trust is formed to reduce the cost of production and to establish and maintain fair and stable prices. Actually, most trusts are formed to create a monopoly, to put prices as high as possible, to reduce wages, and, in general, to make profits.

The trust promoters "got busy" almost before the Dingley bill was signed by President McKinley. They made hay while the tariff sun was shining; they are still in the harvest field, though the hay is nearly all garnered—nearly every article of necessity, except farm products, being the product of some protected trust that fixes prices at the maximum profit point. The trusts lost no time in elevating prices—some 25 per cent, some 50 per cent, and some 100 per cent. The price of wire nails was yanked up from $1.40 per keg in July, 1898, to $2.45 in July, 1899, and to $3.30 in January, 1900. The price of barb wire was pulled up from $1.80 per hundred pounds in July, 1898, to $3.30 in July, 1899, and to $4.13 in January, 1900. It having become evident to the presiding genius then at the head of the American Steel and Wire Company that prices were so high that they were checking consumption, he promptly and precipitately lowered prices of wire and nails one cent a pound. The price of tin plate was lifted from $2.85 per hundred pounds in July, 1898, to $4.05 in July, 1899, and to $4.84 in January, 1900. The price of steel beams was raised from $1.20 in 1897, to $2.40 in 1900. The price of plate glass rose 150 per cent from 1897 to 1900. The price of window glass was shoved up from $1.75 in April, 1897, to $4.80 in April, 1901. Similar advances were made in the prices of most of the other iron and steel products, lead, borax, and of many other articles.

Since 1897, and especially since 1899, the prices of trust products have been maintained at extremely high points. Because of excellent crops, sold at good prices, this country has been prosperous since 1897. But the protected trusts have skimmed the cream of our prosperity and have left only the skimmed milk for workingmen and farmers. Money wages have risen, but tardily and slowly, and only about half as much as has the cost of living. The prices of farm products, until this year, had risen less than had the prices of most manufactured goods.

The average rise of prices is best shown by Dun's index numbers. These include the prices of 350 commodities and give each a weight in accordance with its importance in consumption. On July 1, 1897, Dun's index number was 72,455; on March 1, 1907, it was 109,913, showing an advance in average prices since 1897 of 51.7 per cent. By April 1, 1907, there had been a decline of about 2 per cent. For some reason Dun's figures, which until then had been published regularly for thirty years, have not been published since April. It will be recalled that, because of the cold spring, the prices of cotton, wheat, corn, oats, etc., rose rapidly during April. Possibly there was some connection between these two facts. Possibly the publication of these cost-of-living figures was "accelerating public sentiment" in the wrong direction—for the trusts. It is worth noting that one year previously the Department of Commerce and Labor, at Washington, suddenly ceased to publish Dun's tell-tale figures in its monthly reports. There was considerable of a "spread" between Dun's and the Government's figures of prices, and the spread was growing rapidly. These coincidences may have had nothing to do with the stoppage of the most scientifically constructed cost-of-living figures ever published. Regardless of economic or political consequences, we earnestly hope that Dun's Review will soon continue to give the world the benefit of its price tables.

Bradstreet's less scientifically constructed figures show an increase in wholesale prices of 56 per cent from July 1, 1898, to March 1, 1907. The figures of the Labor Bureau at Washington show that wholesale prices averaged 40.6 per cent higher in 1906 than in 1897. They show that retail prices of food averaged 15.7 per cent higher in 1906 than for the ten years from 1890 to 1899. These Government figures are very unsatisfactory and are evidently made to order. Almost any kind, and almost all kinds, of retail prices can be obtained, even on different streets of the same city. They afford excellent opportunities for trick juggling. It is fair to assume that these opportunities have been utilized. We know that the statistics of the census, so far as they relate to wages and manufactures—especially in the protected industries—are juggled so that they are almost worthless.

It is reasonably certain that the price level in this country is now between 50 per cent and 60 per cent higher than it was ten years ago. It is not pretended that all of this advance should be credited to the Dingley tariff and its brood of trusts. The Labor Bureau report of last spring suggested that "internal revenue and tariff acts have in a marked degree affected prices by helping them to move upward." This is undoubtedly true. About how much of the advance should be credited to the tariff and trusts can be learned from a comparison of our price figures with those of England, where there are no protective duties and no tariff trusts.

Sauerbeck's index numbers advanced 35.1 per cent from July, 1896, to March, 1907—from 59.2 per cent to 80 per cent. The index number of the London Economist advanced 37.6 per cent from the end of 1897 to March, 1907. Since March last it has declined rapidly and is now only 30 per cent higher than in 1897. Its figures in 1897 were 1,890, and on October 1, 1907, 2,457.

It is evident from these figures that during the last ten years prices have risen about 55 per cent in this country and 35 per cent in England. The 35 per cent advance is undoubtedly due to the depreciation of gold. A similar advance has occurred in all countries. The greater advance in this country, Canada, and Japan can fairly be credited to the higher tariffs of these countries and to the protected trusts.

AMOUNT OF TARIFF GRAFT.

To be perfectly safe, suppose we credit only 15 per cent of this rise in prices to our tariff and tariff trusts. What an awful charge against them! We probably consume about $14,000,000,000 worth of goods in a year. Fifteen per cent of $14,000,000,000 is $2,100,000,000—the amount of the tariff-trust graft. Estimated in other ways, and especially by considering the tariff duties on each item and the difference between foreign and domestic prices, it appears that the tariff graft is fully $1,500,000,000.

This graft is far greater than any possible graft from railroad rebates or overcharges, of which we have heard so much lately. It is almost equal to the total gross receipts of all of our railroads—slightly more than $2,000,000,000. It is more than twice the net earnings of all of our railroads.

It is this tariff-trust graft that is most largely responsible for the swollen fortunes that have caused our President such grave concern. He suggests inheritance taxes to lessen somewhat the rapidity of the growth of these tariff swellings. How inconsistent! If he wants not only to stop the growth of but to reduce these obnoxious swellings why does he not try to stop the cause of the swellings? Why does he not attack the tariff walls behind which the trusts and the predatory wealth are intrenched? Are our tariff schedules sacred? Is there any other way to "bust" the trusts so that they will stay "busted," than to "bust" the tariff schedules that shelter the trusts? What does it benefit the common people to have a trust illegalized if its products are sold at higher prices after it is under the ban of our courts? If, by high tariff duties, we license the trusts to prey upon us, can we hope to stop their depredations by the warning fingers of our courts? If we turn the hogs into the garden, can we expect them to refrain from eating the good things there? Is it not clear that the real remedy for trusts is to cut the tap root from which they derive nourishment—the tariff? Is any other remedy half as easy to give or half as certain in its results?

Take the greatest of all trusts—the United States Steel Corporation. It is as clearly a trust and as clearly illegal as was the Standard Oil trust when it was declared illegal. But does anyone suppose that the steel trust would pay any more attention to court decisions—so far as prices are concerned—than did the Standard Oil trust? The tariff graft of the steel trust is between $50,000,000 and $100,000,000 a year. To-day it holds the keys to the tariff situation at Washington. It controls the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means and Rules Committees of the House. It lets nothing get by it in the tariff line. It is the chief of stand-patters—at $75,000,000 a year. It will not give up its tariff keys without a desperate struggle. Those who think otherwise do not know the tariff situation at Washington and do not appreciate the power of the billion-dollar tariff-trust graft.

Other trusts have been "knocked out" by our courts, but are still doing business at the old stands and are charging higher prices than ever. Some of these are the sugar, beef, coal, pipe, and paper trusts. What do these trusts care for court decisions? In no instance have the consumers benefited by antitrust action. Why is the farce continued? Is it to throw voters off the trail? Why not cease barking up the wrong tree? The real remedy for most trusts lies in the removal of the tariff that protects them. This action will not injure the good trusts—those that produce cheaply, sell at fair prices, and charge Americans no more than foreigners for their goods. It will, however, cure most of the evils of big industrial combinations. It will stop them from fattening on the lifeblood of the nation.

TARIFF CONTRACT VIOLATED.

It is not generally known that protective tariff laws got on our statute books through false pretenses. They were put there with an understanding, amounting to an implied contract, that they would be removed should the protected interests at any time combine to stifle competition and to put up prices above a reasonable basis. Here is what Senator John Sherman said in 1899:

"The primary object of a protective tariff is to secure the fullest competition by individuals and corporations in domestic production. If such individuals or corporations combine to advance the price of the domestic product and to prevent the free result of open and fair competition, I would, without a moment's hesitation, reduce the duties of foreign goods competing with them in order to break down the combination."

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years in Congress, says:

"Protection in the perfection of its design does not invite competition from abroad, but is based on the contrary principle that competition at home will always prevent monopoly on the part of the capitalists, assure good wages to the laboring man, and defend the consumers against the evil of extortion."

Mr. Andrew Carnegie is quoted, in the American Manufacturer, of Pittsburg, under date of July 25, 1884, as saying:

"We are the creatures of the tariff, and if ever the steel manufacturers here attempt to control or have any general understanding among them the tariff would not exist one session of Congress. The theory of protection is that home competition will soon reduce the price of the product so it will yield only the usual profit; any understanding among us would simply attempt to defeat this. There never has been nor ever will be such an understanding."

Notwithstanding the statements of these eminent protectionists, the protected interests have taken full advantage of their tariff-monopoly privileges and have combined and put up prices. Moreover, the tariff has existed through several sessions of Congress since these trust conditions have been known. The protected interests have broken their contracts. Why has the tariff not been taken away from them? When will Congress do its duty? When will it protect the people in the only way that they can be protected from the protected trusts?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and, Mr. CRUMPACKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendment, the bill (H. R. 16050) to authorize the Interstate Transfer Railway Company to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour, or so much thereof as the gentleman may need, to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS].

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, on the 16th of last December I introduced in this House a bill providing for a banking and currency commission, to consist of nine members to be appointed by the President, two to be residents of Eastern States, two of the Middle Western States, two of the Southern States, two of the remaining States of the Union, and one from the Republic at large. The bill provides that these commissioners shall have public hearings of not less than three days each in the cities of New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Denver, Fort Worth, New Orleans, and Atlanta, and such other places and under such rules and regulations as the commission may provide.

The bill also provides that they shall cause to be filed with the Clerk of this House, not later than the 1st of December of each year, a stenographic report of these hearings, and also their recommendations as to the revision of our banking and currency laws with reference to devising such a system as, in their judgment, is best calculated to meet the needs of our country.

I wish, as briefly as I can, to discuss to-day the reasons which actuated me in introducing that bill and which impel me now to earnestly press its adoption. In the first place, to touch the banking and currency question under present conditions is a serious undertaking, not one to be entered into hastily or unadvisedly.

The best estimates of the total wealth of this country run all the way from one hundred to one hundred and fifty billions of dollars; our annual foreign and domestic commerce exceeds twenty-six billions of dollars; the banking power of this country is seventeen billions of dollars as against twenty-seven billions of dollars for all the rest of the world; the capital invested in banks in this country to-day, including surplus and undivided profits, is something over two billions and a half of dollars, and the book deposits in these banks is in the neighborhood of fourteen billions of dollars. The clearings of the different clearing houses in the cities of the United States, as shown by the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, were during the last fiscal year, in round numbers, one hundred and fifty-four billions of dollars. These figures stagger the human intellect. And all of these great interests rest upon a money system of about three billions of dollars, which, in fact and in turn, rests upon gold aggregating about one billion and five hundred millions of dollars. Those who think about this question must recognize the danger of either contracting or inflating the currency of the country, and it is rather difficult to tell, dependent upon conditions, which is the more dangerous. My own opinion is that inflation is more dangerous to the whole people in the long run than contraction. This situation is intensified by the fact that perhaps no great subject before the American people involves as much ignorance as banking and currency. I undertake to confess my own ignorance of the subject, and if any of my colleagues are not ready to plead guilty to the charge I believe I will be able to prove their guilt in a cross-examination of twenty-five minutes. The people at large do not know themselves what they want in the way of banking and currency legislation. Nor does Congress know what it wants, nor do the bankers themselves know what they want. The average banker knows nothing of banking and currency as a system. He has only paid attention to existing law sufficiently to acquire knowledge of how to operate the business and keep out of the penitentiary, and make money under his banking authorization.

The prevalent idea that banking and currency as a system is generally and thoroughly understood by the bankers of the country has no foundation in fact, as they will frankly admit when you talk to them about the subject. The reason of this is obvious. We have had great agitation, politically and otherwise, in the press and on the stump about such things as coinage, silver, gold, the tariff, colonialism, and all of that, but we never have had since the civil war or the inauguration of our present banking system any widespread discussion of banking and currency as a system. We have had the Industrial Commission, we have had the Monetary Commission and the Tariff Commission, and widespread research and information poured out to the people, but no such advantage with reference to our banking and currency laws. Not only that, but this is an era of intense and divided political activity. Perhaps never in the history of this country since the civil war has there been in all parties so radical and so intense a difference upon various subjects of legislation as now.

The great party now in charge of this Government is in the struggle of its history to determine whether it shall be a reactionary or a progressive or a stand-pat medium party. Whether it shall become a Roosevelt-Taft Republican party, a Foraker-Fairbanks Republican party, or whether it shall become a Cannon-Knox medium party no man can tell, even in the Republican party itself. These differences, now rapidly disappearing, to a degree have existed among the Democratic organization. Now, what does all this have to do, you say, with this question? It has this much to do with it: No man of sense and patriotism will contend that the banking and currency system of this country ought to be dragged into the domain of partisan politics. There is no reason for it, there is no sense in it, and there is infinite injury in it to the whole people of this country. I came to Congress a very intense partisan Democrat. My own judgment is I am a better Democrat than when I came here; but I know I am far less of a partisan than when I came. And I have a firm, settled policy in my own mind to keep this question out of the domain of partisan politics, and I think if we do that the solution will be the better for the country. [Applause.] Unless some such plan as I suggest is adopted on this great subject, the one remaining great subject of so wide interest to all our 80,000,000 people, and which touches all the great progressive industries of this country, will be thrown into the vortex of Presidential, Senatorial, and Congressional politics, which will obstruct the wise solution of the questions involved in this discussion. That is a reason, in my judgment, why all men should unite in the adoption of some such plan as I propose. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, an editorial from the Houston Post of February 1, a leading partisan Democratic paper in the State of Texas, which as a State perhaps is more interested in the emergency currency, which would affect the moving of our crops to the extent of from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 a year, than any other State in the Union, and yet this paper is willing for nonpartisan purposes to take this position.

Please read, Mr. Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

MR. BURGESS'S CURRENCY COMMISSION BILL.

Representative BURGESS made an eloquent plea the other day before the House Committee on Banking and Currency in advocacy of his bill providing for the appointment of a currency commission. It is Mr. BURGESS's belief that the currency problem should be taken from the domain of party politics and that as a first step toward its solution a commission of nine men should be appointed to investigate the great monetary systems of the world and formulate some plan that will best serve the interests of the country.

Mr. BURGESS told the committee that neither the bankers, Congress, nor the people knew enough of the currency question to justify the adoption of any plan now offered. While this is rather a strong declaration, it is undoubtedly true. The greatest divergence of opinion respecting the currency is found among the bankers. Not one Congressman in a dozen pretends to know anything about it and few of the people ever enjoy an opportunity to study its abstrusities. Under present conditions Congress will not adopt any plan whatever, not because the bills presented are without merit, but because Members are not sure that the proposed changes will improve the present currency system.

The people are likewise uncertain. They distrust the measures formulated by bankers, because they fear that the banks will be given even greater advantages than they now enjoy.

In this diversity of sentiment the prospects for relief are remote. Ultimate reform is possible only when a system is devised by men in whose wisdom and unselfishness the people and the financiers have confidence. A bill formulated by a partisan majority will never command the confidence of the country. Therefore it is essential to eliminate partisanship and create a commission that will devote the necessary time to the investigation of the problem. Otherwise, it is improbable that Congress will ever do anything in the premises.

The appointment of such a commission as Mr. BURGESS advocates will be a long step forward in the direction of reform. Its nonpartisan character, assuming that the members would be men of ability, would allay the suspicions which Congressmen and the people usually entertain toward all currency measures, and the final report would be such a presentation of all the questions involved that Congress and the country could understand them.

The very certainty that both parties will hesitate to accept any measure offered by a partisan committee makes it advisable to first lift the question above the plane of party politics. When that is done substantial progress toward currency reform can be made.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, under such a condition, the pressure is enormous to make the Senator or the Representative adjust his views of banking and currency to the local political conditions which confront him. It is useless to deny that but few men in public life are brave enough, big enough, to determine a course and unflinchingly pursue it uninfluenced by political conditions which involve their continuity in office. To assert this is to say what all of us know and feel, is to confess the truth, which is that Congress needs courage vastly more than it needs capacity. If my plan could be adopted, this great subject of vital concern to 80,000,000 of people who possess more than one hundred billions of wealth, and whose annual foreign and domestic commerce exceeds $26,000,000,000, could be lifted out of the turmoil of partisan politics and the whole body of the people be led into a discussion of the situation, and out of such educational process a wise, nonpartisan, nonsectional, and business revision of our banking and currency laws be effected.

I attach much importance to the provision of my bill which makes it mandatory to have at least three days' public hearings in the various centrally located cities of the Republic. Banking, like every other business, takes color from its environments. The customs and the products of the people vary in different sections, the great mining interests, the great wheat interests, the great corn and cotton interests, the great cattle interests, the great investment interests of the East, each have their various lines of banking. Each of these various sections, to a greater or less extent, has a local press which reaches the majority of the people of those different sections. By having these hearings in accordance with this provision, thoughtful men in every section will have their interest awakened, their knowledge increased, and the tendency will be inevitably for all honest thinkers to urge some good plan best adapted to all the varying needs and conditions of trade throughout this wonderful country. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that such a commission might not recommend to Congress a banking and currency bill that would be passed by the body, but I venture to say that much of the existing ignorance and differences and political by-plays would disappear, and that the country and Congress would much more easily and with much more confidence enact a measure than is possible here and now, and it is of very great importance that any comprehensive revision of our banking and currency laws should be adequately discussed and, at least by those engaged in the business, be generally accepted in advance of its actual operation, so that confidence so absolutely essential to its success may not be shaken and the system at the beginning rendered ineffective.

Mr. Chairman, already we hear in this end and at the other end of this Capitol mutterings about majority and minority bills. They have already pending in the other side of this Capitol a so-called "majority bill" and a so-called "minority substitute;" and if the committee of the House ever brings in anything except some such measure as I propose, I predict we will have a repetition of this miserable situation at this end. What confidence will the American business men and the American people have in a mere political scramble over office by making use of a great business question?

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURGESS. Certainly.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. You propose to appoint a commission; now, will you point to the successful operation of any commission in the history of the Government?

Mr. BURGESS. I believe no commission was ever appointed by Congress to collect information that was not worth infinitely more than it cost, and if it was not, the trouble grew out of the fact that people were not willing to study their reports. I think the Industrial Commission and its report had a profound influence in this county; I think the Monetary Commission and its report had a profound influence in this country; and I think the Tariff Commission and its report had a pronounced influence in this country; but the trouble was just what I am trying to avoid now. There were party differences about the questions with which they dealt, and men lined up with party regardless of what was said in the reports.

You wait until we have the Waterways Commission report, and see what a profound effect that will have for the general good of this country, in my judgment. I do not contend that this Commission's report would be followed by legislation exactly in accord with the recommendations made by it; but I do contend that growing out of it and the education of the masses of the people, under the methods prescribed in my bill, we will be infinitely more apt to have a successful measure, which will be accepted by the whole people than by any bipartisan legislation we may secure now.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. You admit, however, that no recommendation made by the Commission was incorporated into law. Now, a commission is constituted only of men at last. Would not partisanship creep as much into a commission, and would not individual interests, corporate interests, and every class of interests creep into the Commission more easily even than into the membership of this House?

Mr. BURGESS. I do not think so, for this reason: They will be appointed under my bill as the representatives of great sections, to speak for the interests of their sections, and they will not be candidates for reelection at the hands of their constituents, which is the trouble now about this question, in a partisan way. We may as well confess the truth. All of us are more or less inclined to hold our ears to the ground and to preserve that telephonic, sympathetic connection which will promote continuity in office, and that is demonstrated now by the different views and positions that men take on both sides of this question.

But another proposition: Is it not wise, before legislation occurs, to arouse public thought and legislate in accord with an intelligent public demand? What kind of a Government is this? Do we own the people or do the people own us? Do we represent the people? Is it not wise, and especially so with a banking and currency question, so much dependent upon a wide public confidence—is it not infinitely wiser that before we act in a matter like this we discuss the situation broadly with the people and bring into cooperation and harmony, as much as possible, all the various channels of public thought? This will be done under the terms of my bill.

Banking is a colorable business. It takes on form and character largely from the locality and the products and the people with whom the business deals. There are mining banks, lumber banks, sugar banks, rice banks, stock banks, cotton banks, cattle banks, and so on through the great interests of this country. Under this bill public hearings would be held in all the great centers, all the great cities of the country, and the local press which is issued in each section would teem with the hearings and the views of these different representative citizens as to what they thought should be done. The trouble often about hearings is that only the few who have money to pay their way and their hotel bills come to the hearings. We ought to go to the people with these hearings and let the people read in the local press what their representatives think about it, and out of the concensus of discussion and public thought all over the country it is certain, in my judgment, that we will ultimately get wiser legislation for all time to come than we will by any jumped-up legislation that you can whip through this House by any political power on one side or the other or a combination of both.

But there is another reason, potent in the exposition of the strength of the previous reasons, and that is, that the number, nature, and variety of the causes of our present condition preclude any present remedial action. It is my deliberate judgment that no analysis of the causes of our present condition which approaches accuracy suggests even the possibility of any present remedial legislation.

Now, let us look into the causes of this so-called panic, and we will find here the same magnificent disagreement on diagnosis among the Senatorial and Congressional doctors that we find on remedies, when we look at the various bills that have been introduced. One very distinguished Republican, whose views I do not indorse on most public questions, but whose splendid ability and whose dauntless courage challenge every man's admiration, Senator FORAKER of Ohio, says that this panic was produced by a Roosevelt raid on railroads. He is bold and independent about it. He speaks of the billions of dollars involved in these great properties, of arousing public sentiment everywhere to war on them, national and State, of tying up and depressing their securities, of affecting the whole great transportation business of the country, producing this panic. Now, I am one of those who cheerfully voted for the control of the railroads. I believe it is Democratic legislation, and I would not stop in its support because our distinguished friend in the White House became Democratic on that subject and took our three national platforms and recommended their adoption in a Republican House.

Nor do I fall out with my distinguished Republican friends because they suddenly became Democratic in their desire to serve the people in this matter, but frankness forces me to admit that there is a measure of truth in Senator FORAKER'S contention. It was unavoidably true that the attempt to regulate railroads in their rates was to affect the price of their securities, and especially those that had been boosted to a speculative value and those held in Europe. But that does not concern me, however, because if the legislation was just, and I believe it was, it ought to have been enacted, no matter if the effect was unavoidably to hurt the owners of property that had been mismanaged.

But I think that was not a very great cause operating in this panic, as a matter of fact. Of itself it would not have amounted to a ripple on the great financial shore. Two other distinguished Republicans have put that issue more broadly. Ex-Governor Frank Black, who, by the way, nominated President Roosevelt at the last Republican national convention, has recently said, in effect, that this panic was produced by the "man on the barrel;" and Chancellor Day, another distinguished gentleman, has likewise said, in substance, that this panic was the legitimate result of the Roosevelt raid on prosperity and attack on anybody that had any capital or that was trying to do any business.

I do not think myself there is so much in that. I am sure there is nothing in it in so far as President Roosevelt has been Democratic in his policy. I am not so sure but what there is something in it in some policies he has advocated which are un-Democratic, un-Republican, and un-American.

President Roosevelt has advocated the control by the Federal Government of all corporations engaged in interstate business. Seventy-five per cent of the business in this country is done by corporations in interstate business. Doubtless it was true that the holders of these great securities, as great and greater, authorities say, than the total securities of all the railroads in the United States, became alarmed; they feared that Roosevelt's success in regulating the railroads might be speedily followed by his success with Federal regulation of all corporations doing interstate business. That doubtless had the effect to depress the industrial securities and to cooperate for the depression of the railroad securities and to some extent in precipitating the panic. If so, no Democrat can be held responsible, for that policy was never written in the Democratic platform and, in my judgment, never will be. I do not care to discuss it further than to say that it is centralization "gone to seed."

Not only that, but President Roosevelt has recommended a graduated income tax. The Democratic party has declared for an income tax. It did pass such a law. The Democratic party is now for an income tax, but I hope it never will be foolish enough to declare for a graduated income tax, which is an unjust, unfair, un-Democratic, and un-American as a graduated ad valorem State tax on land would be. It means an increase of burden upon every man who has ability enough to increase his income. It violates all Democratic taxation principles and is confiscatory.

Not only that, but Mr. Roosevelt has recommended a Federal inheritance tax. That has never been declared for in any national Democratic platform, and I trust it never will be; not because the tax is not a fair one, but because it is a matter that ought to be handled alone by the States. It rests on such distinct grounds as pertain, in my judgment, alone to the powers of the States with reference to the holding and final distribution of property and the protection of property rights. An inheritance tax, if one is enacted following the logical situation, ought only to be by State enactment. The Federal Government has nothing to do with property and its descent and distribution, and has no business to go into that subject to derive Federal revenue from it.

The late President McKinley was rapidly producing an era of good feeling between the sections and among the classes, and undoubtedly was generally popular, and especially so among the capitalistic classes. The late Senator Marcus A. Hanna was still stronger with these classes, and was as close to the President as any man living. The fact that immediately after the death of President McKinley President Roosevelt proclaimed his purpose to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor predisposed this class toward President Roosevelt. The fact that President Roosevelt began soon thereafter to proceed upon utterly distinct and new lines, which were not approved by these classes, tended gradually to bring them into antagonism with him, and his success before the people and in Congress produced more and more alarm and disquiet in the centers of industry and finance, which has grown intense down to date. I am not discussing the wisdom of his course; I am stating the fact as tending to produce a condition, cooperative with other matters, which tended to precipitate the panic and to make it worse when it came. Again, it is a mistake to assume that all Republicans believe in the extension of Federal powers at the expense of the powers of the States, and large capital becomes easily suspicious along this line. It is my judgment, whatever else may be said of President Roosevelt, that he is, of all the Presidents in the history of the Republic, the centralizationist of our history, and that by word, act, and deed he has done more to magnify the Presidential office unduly and to extend the Federal power than any President the country has ever had, and hence is, in fact, further from fundamental democracy than any President the country has had.

Well, I shall not get more partisan than that. I wish simply to mention briefly those things which in my judgment have mingled with the real causes of this panic, and let the blame fall where it may, I shall be true to myself and my subject as I see it. Another man says that the bulk of this panic was caused by Wall street speculation. There is much in this in my judgment, but I am not willing to lay all the blame on the back of Wall street. I do not think all the speculators and all the gamblers in the country live in the city of New York. There are perhaps more of them there, and they are bigger ones and worse ones in power and effect, but I see no difference in principle in speculation in Texas and speculation in New York. Another one says it was the hoarding of money on the part of the people. I think there is less in that than in anything I have heard assigned as a cause for the panic. That was an incident to the condition, not a cause. If the causes had not operated, there would have been no hoarding, and there you are. Another one says it was holding crops for market in the South and West. I live there, and I love those people down there, but I am not going to be a demagogue about it. Frankly, I think that had some slight effect in the matter, because to withhold the crops from market beyond the normal period of marketing had the effect to lessen the draft in our favor on European gold and to tighten the demand locally among us for money, and that had some effect in the general relation of things—not a very great one in my judgment, nor do I think it is one that ought to be condemned; for if a man owns anything that is the product of his brain or body or both, he has a right to hold it if he can until he gets what he thinks it is worth before he turns it loose.

Another one says that the cause was individual, municipal, State, and national extravagance. I think there is something in that. I think the individuals in this country, the municipalities, the States, and the Federal Government have been going at a terrific pace in expenditure for the last ten years. I think it is time to slow down all along the line, but I think that was rather an incident than a cause of the condition which really produced this panic. Another one says it was governmental favoritism by the Republican party. I would like, if I could, to avoid any partisan reference in this matter, but candor to my subject and fairness to myself compels me to say I think there is much in that. I think the centralization policy of the tariff, that the policy of centralizing wealth by favoritism generally, tends always to aid the production of a panic and to make it worse when the conditions produce it. Undoubtedly the administration of the Government itself by the Republican party has contributed much to the production of this panic and to its magnitude as well. I call to mind the fact that you have administered the Government so as to tax wealth out of the pockets of the people and to accumulate in the Treasury a surplus of about $250,000,000, thus contracting yourself the circulation of the money and then pursuing the policy of loaning this out for nothing, in the aid of Wall street mainly. And this method being known, it tended to sustain a speculative period, and therefore to make the crash worse when it came. The Government ought to be economically administered, so as to make the revenues and the expenditures closely tally, since the taxes are taken up generally, and hence annually the circulation contracted. I wish just here to specifically condemn, no matter what Administration follows it, the practice of accumulating a big surplus in the Treasury, as well as that of loaning it out without interest, and of course, since we are human as well as partisan, to our bank favorites. I think it is true that for a series of years wealth has been taxed out of the pockets of the masses and into the pockets of the classes and that class legislation has given the classes the power to concentrate wealth in a large degree. These classes are massed about the great financial centers, and cooperate with, and in many cases are, stock gamblers, and hence when trouble comes it comes swiftly and with more deadly effect than it would if the wealth of the people had been evenly distributed under wise and beneficent laws, such as I hope to see enacted when the Democratic party comes into power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But it is my candid judgment that not any of these causes, nor all of them combined, would have produced this panic except for other things. I believe two things were mainly responsible for the present panic. Before I name them and elucidate that, I want to size it up in a breath, in a homely sort of way, when I say that for ten or eleven years this country has been on a protracted prosperity "spree," and it has got to "sober up." That is the whole story. All these other causes were more or less cooperative, but minor causes. The major causes were these two things. Let us look back a little. Fifteen years ago we were a debtor country; nearly all of our securities were held abroad. If you wanted to build a railroad you had to finance it in Europe, and if you wanted to go into any great industrial undertaking you had largely to do the same thing, and mortgages of foreign loan companies were plastered all over the soil from Maine to Texas. Two things began to happen, and they happened rapidly and continuously. First, our exports began to run up in excess over our imports. Beginning in 1896 down to date the balance of trade in our favor has been in round numbers four billions of dollars. The American wheat raiser, the American cotton raiser—for cotton is still king and will remain so for an hundred years—the cattle producers, got out their products into the markets of Europe more and more, year by year. Those were the three main articles that make up this great balance of trade, as reports from bureaus of your own Departments will show. What was the effect of that? It rapidly changed us from a debtor to a creditor nation, brought increased capacity to buy everywhere, opened up more farms and more ranches, and that stimulated all the avenues of trade, increased the foreign trade, operated to produce prosperity in the natural, God-given way it must be produced, for I want to say to you that I have contempt for the idea of producing permanent and universal prosperity by law. I believe that prosperity is a hybrid; that it is a product of the blessing of God in soil and season and the industry and intelligence of mankind combined. [Applause.] That is what makes America great. Cooperating with that there were sudden discoveries of gold and cheaper processes of mining, and there began to pour in a flood of money. That increase went into our circulation. We have added in ten years more than a billion dollars to our money in this country, every dollar good, every dollar equal in purchasing as well as debt-paying power with every other dollar.

That process has been going on annually. The last fiscal year we added in gold alone the amount of $125,000,000 to the circulation of our country, an increase of more than $75 per capita, based upon the increase in the population. To give the figures accurately from this last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, we had in 1896 a gold circulation of $8. We have now a gold circulation of $17. What did this all mean? Why, it meant an era of rising prices everywhere. Why? Because it is an eternal, immutable truth that value is the creature of relation. When you measure in dollars that are good it is an axiom that as you increase the dollars you increase the relation and increase the price. There is no escape from it. We have had an era of rising prices. Everything has been going up—stocks, bonds, lands; everything from goats to goobers have been going up for ten years in this country. What is the result of that? Why, every man who had any sense went plunging. He felt that it was a period in which he could get rich quick. He could afford to buy anything if he got it at a fair value now, and that next year it was a cinch it would be worth more; and we went on investing all the money we could get hold of and strained our credit to the limit. Confidence was universal, the country was prosperous, every man's credit was better than he ever knew it to be in all his life before, and all men everywhere rushed into business indiscriminately, looking to the womb of futurity to wring out profits for him. The bears went permanently into winter quarters; the bull was rampart everywhere—in the stock market, in the produce market, in the grain market, in the cotton market, in the real-estate market, in the vegetable market; everywhere the bull was getting in his work, and our Republican friends, with all the political tricks they were capable of and led by the matchless business-vote catcher, Marcus A. Hanna, began whooping this thing for all it was worth. They were going out on every stump, and they were preaching "prosperity follows the flag of Republican victory." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"No calamity can afflict the American people so long as the Government is in the hands of the Republicans." You took advantage of a calamity under the last Democratic Administration, which was more attributable to Harrison's Administration, or the conditions, rather, which existed under Harrison's Administration, than to the conditions under Cleveland, and you went out into the country and you said, "Why, you did this and that; just look what has happened;" and you got a great many cotton raisers to believe that somehow there was kind of a relation between 5-cent cotton and the party in power at Washington. You corrupted the current of public thought; you preached the utterly foolish doctrine that legislation and administrative policies can produce and preserve universal and permanent prosperity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And at a time when every mother's son of you who claimed that could not but admit to yourselves that you fooled the people and yourselves, too. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There was nothing in it; there never was anything in it, and if people expect to be permantely and universally prosperous they must recognize the fundamental truth that all relations of life are interdependent, and that upon the cooperation of honor, genius, industry, and economy, all combined, working upon the natural great resources of our country, depends really the prosperity and the success of the American people. I often have sat here in my seat and thought of two years ago, when my bright and smiling friend, the genial gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], and the courtly little gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and the rugged, vigorous intellect from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] preached to this House the doctrine that the Republican party had produced prosperity in this country, and that all that imperiled it was the possible success of the Democratic party. My friend, Mr. LANDIS, said that you would find all over Indiana signposts everywhere, "All kinds of work for all kinds of men;" and I wondered whether the signs had been taken down lately or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You gentlemen have corrupted, as I said a while ago, the channels of public thought by preaching this kind of paternalistic idea that government is the "daddy" of all the people and flings out its blessings in bunches all around.

Quit it! Let us be honest in the face of this great national crisis. We are willing to help you by standing by the truth now as we stood by it then. We will not charge you with having been wholly responsible for this panic. We will tell the real causes. Now, you have got an opportunity to get straight and get back on the road to truth and right. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is time to make a confession. Under all these conditions the whole people became drunk with the wine of prosperity. They inflated values and credits far beyond actual relations, to which they must in fact conform, if the financial and industrial health of the country is to be perfect. Thoughtful men began to realize that we were floating on the dangerous sea of inflation; stocks and bonds, the first things, perhaps, to respond to such a condition, began to waver in upward tendency, and then to come down; then the bears came out of their winter quarters and proceeded in every artful way, by every device of which they are masters, to further depress the prices by intensifying the scare which existed; the bull banks and the bear banks were drawn into the struggle, as their interests and connections prompted; alarm grew apace, banking antagonisms intensified, the fright wandered into the homes of the depositors, the demand for money suddenly became general and clamorous, Wall street ran to the Treasury—its favorite resort when it wants something for nothing—and got what it could, but it was not enough; and then, in self-defense, Wall street enacted a law of its own and bulwarked itself behind it, and refused to pay out except under a daily limit of an insignificant amount, and then the sober-up process was on everywhere, and the panic was an accomplished fact.

Well, naturally the question suggests itself: What do you want done? Nothing! That is plain English. You tell me that you can legislate values and credits in this country? You tell me that you can legislate public confidence into values and credits, which is but another form of stating the same proposition? You tell me that to inflate the currency would benefit this situation? Not on your life! That would only make it worse. You might just as well talk, and with just as much reason, of legislating a drunken man sober as to legislatively cure this condition. It has got to work itself out. There has got to be a readjustment of values and credits. There has got to be a wider recognition of what honest and conservative banking means, and the bankers are learning a sore lesson in these days. They are learning that this speculation with deposits, and this plunging into various side issues with their bank and involving its capital, will not do. There is no other way to face this situation. There is no use in playing demagogue about it. I am tired to death of this constant cry when anything happens in the country, from an earthquake to a failure of the peanut crop, to run to Congress and the legislatures in order to do something for the people. We have got "American dementia," not on the question of love, but we have got it on the question of law. The Republican party is largely responsible for it. It is time to tell the American people the truth. It is time to say frankly that this condition is beyond legislative present relief. You ask me whether I am in favor of issuing more money, and I tell you no. We are pouring $100,000,000 of gold now into circulation annually. We have now more money per capita than any nation in the world except France, and we have more gold per capita than France has. We do not need it.

The last report of the Comptroller of the Currency says, page 2:

From the latest and most reliable data obtained by the Director of the Mint it is estimated that at the close of the calendar year 1906 the stock of money of the world was $14,281,100,000, divided as follows: Gold, $6,888,900,000; silver (full and limited tender), $3,260,200,000; uncovered paper currency, $4,132,000,000. Eighty-two per cent of the gold—that is, $5,588,900,000—was held by eight countries of the globe, and in amounts in the order named: United States, $1,593,300,000; Germany, $1,030,300,000; Russia, $939,400,000; France, $926,400,000; United Kingdom, $486,700,000; Austria-Hungary, $306,400,000; Italy, $215,500,000, and Spain, $90,900,000. Over 56 per cent of the stock of silver, namely, $1,834,900,000, is held by the same countries, the United States leading with $698,700,000, followed by France with $411,100,000; Germany, $219,700,000; Spain, $173,700,000; United Kingdom, $116,800,000; Austria-Hungary, $105,300,000; Russia, $77,900,000, and Italy, $31,700,000. Forty per cent of the stock of uncovered paper currency was also held by these countries, the United States again leading with $610,800,000, France being second on the list with $269,200,000, followed by Germany with $267,100,000; Italy, $150,600,000; Austria-Hungary, $119,300,000; United Kingdom, $116,800,000, and Spain, $97,100,000. Outside of the countries named India has the largest stock of gold, namely, $337,300,000, followed by Argentina with $102,700,000. The stock of gold in Japan is $80,100,000. The latter country reports silver to the amount of $48,200,000 and uncovered paper currency, $96,900,000. Exclusive of the United States, the largest stock of silver is in India, namely, $603,800,000. The circulation of Colombia, with the exception of $100,000 in gold, is in uncovered paper currency, stated at $1,000,000,000. The per capita of gold, $23.57, and of all money, $40.88, is the greatest in France, followed by the United States, with a per capita of gold of $18.66 and a per capita of all money of $33.99. Germany is third in the list, with a gold per capita of $17 and an aggregate per capita of all circulation of $25.03. The details of the Mint report relate to 47 countries, and include information as to the monetary standard, monetary unit, and population of each country.

An on pages 330 and 331 he gives a table showing per capita circulation, by countries, as follows:

e The figures for the total stock of gold in India are for the net imports since 1893-94 plus the production of the country. The amount in the government treasury is from official advice. The net imports of gold since 1835-36, when the records begin, amount to $841,407,489, and the production recorded to $115,030,200. The tide of gold and silver has been flowing into India for centuries.
f Includes Straits Settlements, the Malay States, and Jehore.
g L'Economiste European, January 1, 1906.
h Except Costa Rica and British Honduras—gold-standard countries.
i Le Marche Financier, 1907.
k These figures may include some gold credits in foreign banks.
NOTE.—The value of the monetary stock of the silver-standard countries has been changed to conform to the decline in silver values. The monetary stock of Mexico and other countries where the Mexican dollar circulates is given in Mexican dollars at bullion value.

From these facts it seems clear, when we consider the further fact that we are adding more than a hundred millions in gold to our circulation annually, that we do not, at this time, need any permanent addition to our money volume. What we need is a wide recognition of the necessity for sobering up as quickly as possible and getting busy about it. That is all. Now, do you think anything ought to be done hereafter? Yes; I think so. That is one of the reasons why I am pressing my banking and currency bill. I think it may be possible to devise some safe and wise emergency currency system which will lessen the force and effect of these recurrent periods of inflation when they come, as come they will. You need not be in a hurry about it, however. It may be ten years before another one comes. The Presidential election will be over to a dead moral certainty before another one comes. You need not worry about that. I think this one will last until after the Presidential election. I hope it will not last any longer. But I can tell you more easily what I do not want and why I do not want it, than I can tell you what I do want and why I do want it. I have somewhat decided views as to some things that are pending, that I do not want, and I desire to mention them and tell why I do not want them. One of the first of these is the Fowler bill. Now, it may be possible in a series of future years that some such plan as this distinguished and able man proposes may finally be arrived at.

But I will tell you now if he expects the American Congress and the American people to adopt a bill so radical in all of its provisions, changing all existing systems from top to bottom, he is absolutely hugging a delusion to his bosom. The interests are too vast. The public tension is too suspicious and acute. The situation is such that if we ever come to any such system as he proposes, it must be through a series of years by careful steps, each tested by the light of experience. The main and serious objection to his bill is that it is too sweeping, too drastic, too infinite, too great in its effects, to be considered for a moment.

Then, there is the Aldrich bill. I need not discuss it in detail, because I presume all of the Members are thoroughly familiar with its provisions. It proposes, in brief, to issue $500,000,000 of currency upon the security of State, municipal, and railroad bonds. I do not care to discuss the railroad feature, because you could cut that out and I would be against it as I was before. I am not going to be led into the bushes on that.

I am opposed to any sort or any form of such bond currency. It will not do, for several reasons. In the first place these State and county bonds inevitably drift into the hands of a few owners of large capital, and that sort of emergency currency must simply mean a bondholders' currency. It puts in the hands of a few men the power to contract or inflate our currency at will. This will do no good to the money centers, it will do no good to the agricultural and mining sections, but do infinite hurt in fright and scare and uncertainty and unrest all the time to the whole country. It is no advantage to the country. You say that it will increase the price of those State and municipal bonds. Doubtless that is true.

But that only makes a bad matter worse for two reasons. In the first place it is bad enough for the Federal Government to have a banking system based on boosting its national bonds. To have another class of currency, called emergency currency, based on boosting the bonds of the States and municipalities is a governmental procedure which I can not at all indorse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, by authority of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] I yield to the gentleman twenty minutes.

Mr. BURGESS. Thanks; I will try to get through in that time.

Not only that, these securities and bonds can not be held by the banks in the South and West, because of the low rate of interest; and if you pass a bill for this currency system, which you admit would lower the rate of interest on such bonds, you will make it impossible for the banks in the South and West, in the great developing sections, the great crop-moving sections, the sections where they are really interested in an emergency currency, to have any advantage at all out of such currency. The banks out in those sections that can loan their money at 8 and 9 and 10 per cent will not invest in bonds that are bearing 2, 3, and 4 per cent. They can not afford it; and when the pinch comes they will have no money to buy the bonds and will have to hie themselves away to the financial centers to get the money; and they will be in a worse condition than they were before. Any man who favors that kind of a policy had better change his domicile to the East, for he will be put out of office by an outraged people.

Another proposition is greenbacks. I thought that had been settled. I thought that never again would we have a proposition to issue irredeemable paper money, and I am not going to seriously discuss it now, further than to say that I believe, and I have always believed, in an intrinsic-value dollar and paper money redeemable in such coin, and every dollar coined and issued shall be the equal of every other dollar in purchasing as well as in debt-paying power. I shall support no system of coinage or currency which does not conform to these principles.

Another much-advocated plan is presented in various forms or guaranteeing the deposits of the banks. I shall not support any such scheme as that. I wish to give reasons as briefly as I can why I will not support any proposition, whether directive or permissive, guaranteeing deposits in national banks. In either case the principle is identical, for there is no difference between a father who directs his boy to do a foolish thing and the father who permits the boy knowingly to do a foolish thing. He indorses it and is responsible for the principle.

This is the first objection I have to this, that it is socialistic in its tendency if not in effect. Why? Under that plan you would throw in hodgepodge capacity and character with incompetency and rascality and lay a tax on all to protect the negligent depositors and the incompetent and rascally banks at the expense of the wise and conservative bankers and the careful depositors. Not only that. There is a worse thing involved in it than that.

It is the inalienable right of every individual in this country to get all the premium that character and capacity gives him in any business in which he seeks to engage, and if he goes into the banking business he is a candidate for deposits. The essence of socialism is to equalize by law capacity and character and opportunity; to make all men equal in property and privilege and happiness. It's a dream of the impossible. To admit the possibility of its accomplishment is a confession of ignorance of that true nature and condition of mankind upon which is grounded all religion and all wise government. "Equal rights to all men and special privileges to none" is an immutable truth. An open, fair field for competitive struggle is the thing. The banker is no exception.

He has his character and his capacity as well as his capital as an inducement to invite these deposits, and by this sort of plan you say to the conservative banker, "Your character and capacity are worth nothing to you in your struggle for deposits. We take that advantage away from you and minimize it and equalize it with the other banker who is incompetent, without character or capacity, and you can not get deposits by reason of that any more than he can." It is a wrong governmental principle. It is a step toward socialism, toward the destruction of the value of character and capacity in the practical operation of the banking business. It is a blow at competitive struggle.

That leads me to the next objection, which is as bad, and that is that it is bad business policy, as bad as the governmental policy. The Book says, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," and I believe the fear of the depositor is the beginning of wise, conservative banking. It is no answer to say to me, as I have many friends say, "Why, the average depositor does not know anything about the condition of the bank." Maybe so, but he may know. The banker knows he may know. The knowledge that he may know has the same effect on the banker as if he actually knew. Not only that, but many of these national banks are one-man affairs. Directors are dummies; the controlling stock is actually owned by one man. He dictates it and controls it in the hollow of his hand, and almost invariably in such a case he uses the bank as an adjunct to other and speculative enterprises outside. Now, if you remove this check and pile up deposits in his bank, you will only increase his venturesomeness, his power to do evil, by the use of the deposits in the bank and these speculative outside ventures.

But you say that the banker would not make an investment or a loan under the guaranty system that he would not make under the present system. Well, you do not know men as I do. Men are often nicely balanced in their judgment, good men and conservative men, as to whether they will make a certain investment or not, and the wavering balance is tipped against the investment when the depositor is out on the end of it. Take away that balance, and he will make the investment, he will take the risk, and in the case of the rascal and the incompetent it is a cinch that he will do it. That is not all. It is impracticable anyhow under the conditions that obtain. Let me read to you from the report of the Treasurer, just issued. On page 419 you will find this:

The percentage of capital of national banks to capital of all banks in 1906 was 50.23; deposits, 32.12. For the present year the percentage of capital is 49.66 and of deposits 31.66. During the period from 1902 to 1907 the percentage of capital of banks other than national to the capital of all banks has increased from 47.06 to 50.44 per cent and the percentage of individual deposits in such banks from 67.7 to 68.34.

From that it is clear that of individual deposits in the country, 68 per cent are in banks other than national banks. Now, we have no authority to deal with any banks except national banks. If you pass a guaranty law of any sort, permissive or directive, if these gentlemen are right when they say that such a law would bring the hoarders up with their cash, then it must be more certain that those who have their deposits in banks where they may lose would rush to take them into banks where they could not lose, and an era of bank panic and bank collection and debt collection would be precipitated that would involve 68 per cent of all the depositors of the country and half of all the bank capital of the country.

"Oh," but you say, "we will put the operation of the law off so far that these can all cooperate with the system that we enact." Yes; but how will they cooperate? They could not organize under a national-bank charter, because they could not get bonds enough to do it, and they could not cooperate otherwise, because forty-six States would have to act on this matter through their legislatures and change their systems and adjust themselves to it; and even if they could, the fear that they could not or that they would not would operate in the meantime to make men get into all kinds of financial troubles about their deposits, their business, and their capital.

That is not all of this miserable policy, which is like all socialistic schemes, fair to look at and bitter to taste. Suppose we inaugurated the system; suppose all of the banks cooperated, the State banks, the national banks, and the private banks all come under it and everybody's deposits are secured. What then? At once there is set up a competitive struggle among the bankers for deposits. One pays 2 per cent, another pays 3 per cent, another pays 4 per cent, another pays 5 per cent, and it is a cinch that the more competent, conservative, and wise the banker is the lower rate of interest he would pay. So this miserable plan stands revealed in its last analysis as a scheme to induce men to wild and speculative banking, a plan necessarily leading to wild and speculative banking. A banker who is willing to take the risk runs the rate of interest up, gets more deposits, and plunges into speculative enterprises, trusting to recoup himself for the high rate of interest.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Let me suggest another thing to the gentleman. The only margin of safety is the double liability of the stockholder, which can not be loaned, and under the guaranty system a $25,000 bank would be as liable to receive a million dollars of deposits as a million-dollar bank would.

Mr. BURGESS. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut for his suggestion. There are a number of other reasons that would suggest themselves, but I think these reasons which I have given are sufficient and will, if you accept them, settle that controversy and eliminate that issue.

Now, what else? Frankly, I am uncertain, and I think everybody else is that I have talked with, whether we should have a central Government bank with branch banks or whether we should have the German plan grafted on to our plan, as suggested by the bankers' association, or whether we shall change the whole system suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER]. I will tell you what I think it is best to do, and that is have a banking and currency commission thrash it out and try to do what is wise and right. We are at a time where we can get the whole public aroused, where we can arouse all the patriotism and the best sense of the country, and get a plan that will work splendidly for years.

You know, and I know, and all of us know, that our present banking system is nothing but a piece of crazy patchwork, born of the necessities of war times and patched at ever since, from then to now, and if anything is done here this Congress it will be only another patch put on this system. We can have a comprehensive revision of our banking and currency laws and perhaps some adaptation that will permit a safe and sound emergency currency that will work automatically, will meet these fluctuating periods in crop movements, and will lessen the effect of panics of inflation and contraction periods in the future. I hope such a system can be devised.

It is rather my opinion that such a commission as that for which my bill provides, operating as directed in the bill, would lead public thought to this conclusion; they would devise and recommend in detail some such general plan as that proposed by the bankers' association, which, as I understand it, is an effort to take the principle of the German system and graft it upon our present national banking system. I am frank to concede my attachment to the theory that all the money coined and issued should be coined and issued by the Government. But theories are only valuable as they are practicable and workable theories. If the Government is to issue an emergency currency, unless under some such plan as the Aldrich plan, it must go into the banking business, with a central bank and branch banks, so that money, when issued, can be loaned to the people and can be taken out of circulation when the need passes. I am not willing for the Government to go into the banking business. It is likely true that but for the partisan character of our Government the German plan as a whole would work well here, or the French plan as a whole would work well here; but I do not believe that any central bank, with or without branch banks, would work well in a country so intense in its politics and so divided in its interests as ours. Now, if we are not going to do either of these things, namely, issue a bond-secured emergency currency or go into the banking business with the Government, what other plan has anybody to suggest, save some such plan as that proposed by the bankers' association? It may be that recommendations of bankers are looked on by the people a good deal like the Prohibitionists would view resolutions of the brewers' association. But if this plan was thoroughly thrashed out before the country, and the men who are in banks, as well as those who are not, strove earnestly together to develop the best possible system for an emergency currency, it is my opinion they will be forced to some such plan as this. Under that plan all good security would receive equal governmental consideration. If an emergency currency could be issued by national banks in addition to their present bond issues, based properly upon their reserve and capital, properly limited in amount and with proper rates of interest, under such a system cotton and wheat sections, mining and cattle sections, would have equal opportunity for such emergency currency as their needs demanded, nor would Wall street be any worse off. It looks to me as if the national banking system were here to stay and that it is useless to talk about getting rid of it for years to come.

And it is a debatable question, to say the least of it, whether it would be wise to get rid of it at all, save by the gradual process of paying off the national bonds. They would be the best existing medium through which to issue an emergency currency, and I see no reason why such a plan can not be devised which would be "safe and sane." I am of opinion also that changes in the system should be made, such as changing the reserve features so as to give greater security to the depositors and stability and independence to the banks and more strict supervision of them in the interest of the public.

In conclusion, I thank my colleagues for their earnest attention. [Applause.]

COTTON TAX.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter relating to the cotton tax.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter relating to the cotton tax. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., February 7, 1908.

HON. FRANK CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CLARK: I have read with very great pleasure your exhaustive speech on the cotton tax, which I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 29th January.

For years I have lived with the memory of the cotton tax, and your speech has given me such satisfaction that I feel that a long-absent friend has returned to gladden my old age.

You will recognize in my signature the case of Farrington v. Saunders, and will understand the very great interest I have felt for about forty years in this matter. Mr. Robertson Tapp, who has been dead many years, was the father of my wife, and the cotton tax was a never-ending subject of conversation around our family circle.

I paid the tax to the collector in Memphis and shipped the cotton to Liverpool. We conferred with such eminent lawyers as Judge Curtis, Judge Sharkey, Phillips, Pike, Tapp, William M. Evarts, and others, and they all expressed great faith in the outcome of our case—certainly on its merits.

A few years ago, before Mr. Evarts's death, when we were considering presenting a bill before Congress, I wrote to inquire if he would go before a committee of the House and present our case, and he readily consented to do so, and wrote me that he had conferred with Judge Curtis, who agreed with him that the tax was unconstitutional. I have his letter somewhere with my papers. I don't think Mr. Evarts filed a written argument; only made an oral one.

I have written from time to time to various distinguished men on this subject, such as Senator CLAY, JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, and others, who fully concur with you about this tax.

I feel much gratified that the Honorable Grosvenor should have the independence to express himself as he did in his letter to you. I saw in the daily press an account of your speech. I will thank you to send me several copies for myself and friends. I will add that after reading what you said to Congress, that my faith in recovery has been renewed. It may be delayed, but, like the French spoliation claim, it must meet with justice. I was a merchant during the years 1862–1868 and represent many claims for this tax.

Very respectfully, WM. M. FARRINGTON, 526 Beale Avenue.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks I made on Monday last respecting a bill to establish a Federal court at Jackson, Ky.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I present a petition which relates to the Aldrich bill, and which, having read it myself, I think will shed some light on certain phases of the financial situation to such a degree that I feel willing to ask that it be read from the desk.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: Exercising the right of petition given by the Constitution to each citizen, the undersigned respectfully petitions and earnestly protests against the passage of the currency legislation known as the "Aldrich bill," because it would be against public welfare.

Such a law would start agitation that might take from national banks the right under which they now profitably issue and loan to the people nearly $700,000,000 of bank-note currency, and perhaps jeopardize the gold standard itself. Will such banks grasp for more and possibly lose what they already have?

Bank-note currency is not a legal tender; its acceptance as money can not be compelled. Few know this. Prominent lawyers, business men, and even several Members of Congress disputed this fact until shown the law. The people generally are deceived by the Government's indorsement into believing it to be real money. It looks like money, but it is not. Anyone can refuse to accept it. Then actual money, gold or Treasury notes, must be found and tendered. This demand at last moment may work great loss and wrong. Do we want $500,000,000 more currency that is not lawful money?

Many claim that the Constitution vests in Congress the exclusive power to issue money; that it should not be delegated to banks for private profit; that all bills and coin which the people will consider money should be real money, a legal tender, and issued by the Government; that this need not be fiat or greenback, but paper money redeemable in gold, issued by the Government direct to any bank or individual depositing the proper bond securities and paying the currency tax; that issuing this currency, as now, to national banks, and by them to borrowing producers, adds nothing to its value, but it imposes extra burden and cost on the people for the profit of banks monopolizing the same. Therefore, that this $700,000,000 bank-note currency should be called in and replaced by a legal-tender bond-secured Government currency, real money, redeemable in gold. Some even advocate abolishing the gold standard. They fear danger in having so many billions of bonds and debts payable only in gold while so large a proportion of the total currency is merely bank notes, the acceptance of which can not be required. Especially so when it is known that the associated individual wealth of a half dozen powerful gamesters of Wall street is large enough to purchase and individually own and lock up every dollar of gold coin in the United States and demand any price therefor from those who must have the actual gold to pay the vast quantities of maturing bonds. It is not necessary for me to now express a personal opinion on these widely prevailing views.

Unwise currency legislation will react. It will defeat the party responsible for it, for the people this year are in no mood to overlook the wrong of the enactment of any law believed to be for the express benefit of Wall street. And there are strong indications that one of the chief designs of the hidden and crafty promoters of this legislation is to make it the clever means for discrediting the party in power and the Administration in the national campaign of 1908, that the hands on the dial of progress may be turned back seven years and incorporated lawlessness escape the penalty for its premeditated and lawyer-planned crimes.

It is believed that Wall street gladly will swap the Presidency for the rich fruits and dangerous powers contained in the Aldrich bill, for this would also satisfy their well-known spirit of revenge, and block all progressive legislation between a Democratic Administration and Republican Congress.

For years a cry has been raised for an elastic currency. One that would automatically expand and contract with the volume of business. This seemed reasonable. We all approved. Of course the natural law of supply and demand should govern. It was plausable. The entire country began to keep step with this music. Then a panic came. It appeared—"providentially"—just before this session of Congress, when it was planned to seek currency legislation. It was cleverly declared by the promoters that the panic was due to lack of elastic currency to move crops and to serve as buffer to take up the shock of panics. They did not explain why the country has got on so well for a dozen years without panic or change in the currency laws. Many believe the panic was caused by such promoters to pinch the country into hurrying Congress to hastily pass the currency legislation they desire, to punish the Administration for enforcing the laws without fear or favor, to advance interest rates, and to reduce wages of labor and prices of securities and property for their lawless purposes and profit.

The failure of the Knickerbocker Trust Company precipitated the runs on banks and panic. Sudden refusal by one Wall street bank further to clear for that trust company, and wild exploitation of that fact in the newspapers wrecked the trust company. The powerful master of Wall street, who is said to dominate that bank, sat in the gallery of the United States Senate and nodded approval as the distinguished author of the Aldrich bill spoke in advocacy of the measure.

One of the most prominent officials of one of Wall street's large financial institutions recently stated to your petitioner that the reason for an elastic currency was so that money would not get over-plenty after crop-moving time, for this might tempt bankers to compete for loans and lead to reduction of the interest rate. Thus Congress is asked to make money scarce by law so as to remove competition and create money monopoly to enable those who traffic in money for interest profits to force the borrowing producers of the country to pay a higher price for the money they must have to carry on industry and business. This is Wall street's real motive for elasticity.

But the actual bills now have appeared in Congress. One is called "Aldrich bill;" the other is for a privately owned central Government bank. Neither is for an elastic currency. Each seeks a contraction currency. Both wish to take from the Government and put into private hands the dangerous power to contract and expand the public currency suddenly in large volume. This would enable them to manipulate at will the prices of listed securities, property, and labor by simply making money scarce or plenty. They could then create panics to terrorize country banks and force them to call loans and hoard money for safety, destroying general credit and wrecking industry. Do the 12,000 bankers of the country desire to be always at the mercy of so few men?

At the recent meeting in New York of the National Civic Federation, Mr. Seligman, speaking for the large number of Wall street bankers present, flatly refused to consent to the amendment to their currency resolution offered by your petitioner. This amendment provided simply that the power to contract and expand the public currency should remain in the Government and not be put in private hands. This was a public admission that Wall street seeks to take this dangerous power from the Government and put it in banks controlled by them. The Aldrich bill does this most effectively. It would be an unconstitutional delegation of a legislative function.

For years Congress refused to repeal the provision prohibiting national banks contracting the bank-note currency over $3,000,000 a month. March 4, 1907, this was raised to $9,000,000. This was too dangerous a power to be left at the option of the banks. They might contract rapidly to raise interest rates and force down prices.

The biggest "joker" in the Aldrich bill is the fact that this restriction is wiped out entirely. It makes it possible suddenly to contract and destroy the entire $700,000,000 bank-note currency, and also the $500,000,000 emergency currency, or a total of $1,200,000,000 of currency used by the people as money. Sudden contraction of but $50,000,000 available money by bank depositors recently caused fearful panic and alarmed the whole country. What would happen to the country when the strangling contraction of more than a billion dollars, about half the available money supply of the United States, the active and convenient half, was begun?

But the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury must be had, it is said. The language of the bill on this point is doubtful. But even if he must consent, are 85,000,000 of people going to risk their all not alone on the honesty but on the judgment of one man, a mere appointed official not responsible to the people? Without intending personal allusion, it is proper to show that most Treasury officials leave the public service and its humble salaries to secure and enjoy positions with Wall street banks paying $25,000 to $50,000 salary. They could not do this if their conduct in public office should displease such interests.

The only way to make this emergency currency elastic more than in name is to have the Government issue it direct to national, State, or savings banks, trust companies, corporations, and individuals, to all who deposit the required bonds as security and pay the high tax. Then supply and demand would control, and it would be impossible for interest rates ever to go above, say, 8 per cent anywhere. The volume then would automatically expand at crop time and contract afterwards. But the Aldrich bill grants to the national banks alone the absolute monopoly of the entire half billion dollars of emergency currency. Other monopolies are made crimes by law. The Government on its own initiative can not issue one dollar of emergency currency. Not even in response to a general public sentiment or wide business distress. It must wait for national banks to first act. These will not do so except when actually menaced by runs. So it is in no sense an elastic currency for general benefit, such as the country was educated to expect.

Ordinary country banks would not profit at all. Only the big Wall street banks are situated to borrow this emergency currency from the Government at 6 per cent and loan it to the gamblers of the stock exchange at 10 per cent to 200 per cent. The few big operators now the masters of Wall street dominate the big banks, trust, and insurance companies, railroads and other industries. Their individual fortunes aggregate over a billion of dollars. They control institutions with $4,000,000,000 more of loanable assets. They dominate enterprises with outstanding securities exceeding twenty thousand millions of dollars. These few men comprise the huge pools which artificially sustain and manipulate all large issues of securities, putting the quotation prices up and down at will and for their private profit. Their identity and transactions are hidden by the stock exchange. This makes them more daring, reckless, and merciless. Every man who buys even one share of listed stock or one bond, whether on margin speculation or for investment, is blindly playing directly against this vast Gibraltar of financial strength, this crafty, crooked, and soulless power. Ultimate loss is as certain as death to those who continue to dabble in Wall street.

These lawless and relentless masters of Wall street are trying hard to promote the legislation found in the Aldrich bill. They will be the principal beneficiaries. It will give them a strangle hold on the money supply. It will vastly increase their dangerous powers. It will enable them to cause panic at will. It will multiply their political power. By controlling the Secretary of the Treasury they will dominate every bank in the land, and build for themselves the greatest political machine in all governmental history. Nothing could dislodge it.

If this syndicate ever finds the load too heavy even for its giant resources when it happens to be buying heavily to advance prices at a time when natural conditions otherwise would lower them, this emergency currency will come in handy. They will have their banks take an armful of these securities to the Treasury of the Republic and exchange them for real money, which the syndicate will borrow and plunge into the fierce and frenzied gamble. This will enable them to win against the public where otherwise they might have lost, for they get the Government's money at 6 per cent, while the public must pay, perhaps, 50 to 200 per cent on call loans borrowed on the open stock exchange. And they also get the money practically in unlimited quantities and pay it back only when they get ready, instead of when called, for the Government never can call in the emergency currency. It will be a dangerous curse to everybody else.

Enhancing the price of municipal bonds by designating them to secure currency will be for the benefit of the public, as with Government bonds. But it is quite a different thing gratuitously to put an immediate extra profit of more than $1,000,000,000 into the pockets of the private owners of railroad bonds by thus legislatively enhancing the quotation prices thereof, especially so when it will go to Wall street. The Aldrich bill requires the Secretary of the Treasury to keep posted on the prices of such bonds. As they are subject to possible violent manipulation daily, the only way he can do this is to follow the custom of the brokers and big banks of New York and install in the Treasury Department—and perhaps in the White House—the usual Wall street ticker, that from 10 to 3 each day the officers of the Republic may read the gamblers' tape and quickly call for more margins or sell out the collateral on the Stock Exchange, as is customary in the great American game, to avoid loss.

It is significant that the combined capital and surplus of the three big Wall street banks said to be dominated by Morgan, Rockefeller, and Ryan—the City National, First National, and National Bank of Commerce—exceeds $100,000,000, or an amount equal to the combined capital stock of 1,000 country banks with $100,000 capital each. These three banks could take out, and also contract, over $50,000,000 of emergency currency. They can at the same time also issue and contract $50,000,000 of ordinary bank-note currency. This reveals the vast power of these banks and what they are after. So, independent of the other 12,000 banks of the country, the wishes of 85,000,000 people or of their responsible Government, or of the interests or welfare of the Republic, the Aldrich bill proposes deliberately to make it possible for three banks, said to be dominated by three men, to manipulate more than $100,000,000 of the public currency of the United States for their personal profit and advantage. And these are the principal bank factors in that great paradise of gamblers.

I have it on the word of prominent members of the Stock Exchange that more than 90 per cent of all deals are purely gambling transactions; that Wall street's gambling business exceeds $30,000,000,000 annually, four times the value of all crops of the entire United States; that this could all be stopped without harm to the useful and legitimate business of Wall street; that investment would be safer and quotations no longer would fluctuate violently, but would be steady and represent actual values. Besides losing their capital up as margins, the victims are also charged by the brokers over $200,000,000 a year as commissions and "interest" for the privilege of being fleeced in the most colossal, crooked, dangerous, and merciless gambling institution of all human history. This includes the several million dollars stamp taxes which the State of New York collects from charges made on each gambling transaction as its price for the law immunity and habitation which it grants to this institution to prey upon and despoil its citizens and those of the entire country. And this gambling does not benefit the country one dollar, but curses and ruins countless thousands.

Bidding up interest rates on call loans to 10, 30, 60, 100, and even 200 per cent is the great magnet used to entice the deposit savings of the entire country away from local industry and business, and plunge them headlong into the vortex of the great gambling business of Wall street. This deranges the currency supply, interferes with legitimate business, burdening the same with ruinous and usurious interest charges, causes panics, and endangers credit and confidence constantly, paralyzing enterprise and prosperity.

Margin gambling and usurious rates on call loans should be stopped by law. New York State can do this. It is believed that Congress can also make them unlawful. It can prohibit national banks charging over 6 per cent on time or call loans. These banks then would induce the States to pass the same law as to State banks and individuals. It would seem that Congress has ample constitutional power to make unlawful margin gambling in the stocks of corporations transporting or engaged in interstate commerce. These two things done, there would be no serious currency problems to solve. And frequent and sudden panics no longer would occur. The lawless and dangerous power of Wall street would be broken, and without harm to its useful and legitimate business.

Wall street calls all banks but its own, country banks. These can live and prosper independently of Wall street banks and much safer. To a large extent the outside banks have been made the willing or unwilling tools and victims of Wall street. Now they are suspected by many of being in secret alliance with and profiting from that great gambling game. These banks are expected to bring local pressure upon Congressmen. Parties now in Washington are assuming to speak for all these banks in advocacy of the Wall street currency measures. The people believe these measures selfish, unpatriotic, and dangerous, and that their chief advocates outside of Congress have sinister motives.

Where do these banks stand? If not openly against it, they will be considered for it. Can they afford to endanger public confidence in their banks by having them considered an annex of Wall street's gambling institutions? If they do, when the fight it will bring on shall take from them perhaps a hundred times what they may hope to obtain in benefit from these schemes, they can not complain. They must know something of the present temper of the public mind. It will become more aroused as the fight goes on between the lawless powers of Wall street and the Government and people of the United States in the great struggle for the industrial, financial, and political conquest of the greatest Republic of all history.

Although this is signed by me alone, I know it represents the views of very many others. Therefore your petitioner earnestly urges the defeat of the Aldrich bill.

Very respectfully, yours, ALFRED O. CROZIER.

WILMINGTON, DEL., February 11, 1908.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit two amendments intended to be proposed to what is known as the "banking bill," S. 3023. They are quite short, and I would be glad to have them read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendments will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 3, after "SEC. 8," insert:

That from and after November 1, 1908, every national bank shall have and keep on hand in its vaults the reserve of lawful money provided for by law. All laws and parts of laws which authorize national banks to have and keep part of their reserve in other national banks are hereby repealed.

On page 10, line 12, after the word "depositaries," insert the following provisio:

Provided, That whenever public money is deposited in national banks said banks shall pay to the United States interest on such deposits, to be collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows: For the months of August, September, October, and November of each year at the rate of 2 per cent per annum; for the months of December, January, February, and March of each year at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and for the months of April, May, June, and July of each year at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement to the Senate. It will be brief.

I want to read a few lines of a colloquy that took place yesterday during the discussion of the financial bill. I am reading from page 1962 of the RECORD:

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, while I have the floor, and it not being quite 2 o'clock, as reference has been made to the bill which I introduced some time ago and which is now pending before the Committee on Finance, with reference to reserves, I desire to state why I introduced the bill, which is as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act every national bank shall have and keep on hand in its vaults the reserve of lawful money provided for by law. All laws and parts of laws which authorize national banks to have and keep part of their reserve with other national banks, and all laws and parts of laws otherwise in conflict herewith, are hereby repealed."

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I submit to the Senator from Texas that not one dollar of that reserve could be legally used.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not so understand the law. Of course I may be mistaken, but the purpose was to keep that money in the banks to meet emergencies. If it was not to meet an emergency, what was it to be kept there for?

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Texas pardon an interruption?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. It seems to me—certainly my understanding is—that if a bank in the country had a reserve in its vault it could not have used a dollar of that reserve without violating the law. If the Senator is right, it is of the utmost importance certainly that we should understand at this point in the discussion which is the correct view. I appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator mean that that is absolutely necessary?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly not absolutely necessary.

Mr. ALDRICH. The law undoubtedly requires that the reserve shall be maintained, and if the bank fails to maintain it, the Comptroller can take possession of the bank.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is not my understanding as to deposits. Of course I may be mistaken about it, but I was saying that the purpose in the bill I have introduced was to keep on hand a reserve in the banks in the interior for the purpose of meeting extraordinary runs which may be made upon the banks by depositors.

What is the one hundred and fifty million gold reserve in the Treasury vaults for? It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury is required to keep that amount of gold in the Treasury, but when a gold obligation is presented to him he is required to pay it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is for a specific purpose.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I understand that.

Mr. TELLER. And it is not subject to the control of the Treasury except for the redemption of greenbacks.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that, Mr. President, but I was only illustrating the object of a reserve. It is to meet an extraordinary occasion that may arise. The idea of the bank reserve is that all the country banks should keep on hand in cash 15 per cent of their deposits, as it would in all probability meet any demand which might be made upon them by their depositors.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that the banking law fully bears out his statement that the reserve may be used temporarily for purposes of meeting unexpected conditions arising in the bank. I refer to the national banking act as it is issued by the Comptroller of the Currency during this year, page 24, section 95. It provides that where the reserve is found unexpectedly decreased below the amount fixed by law the Comptroller may give notice and require it to be made good within thirty days. That contemplates that it may be brought down by extraordinary circumstances.

Mr. President, this involves a very plain proposition, and I think everyone understands that it ought to be made perfectly plain in the RECORD. So far as I am concerned, of course I understand what "the reserve" means; but during the debate yesterday I answered a question the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] addressed to me without fully hearing the question, because I thought he had reference to the line of deposits in the country banks. When the Senator from Florida asked me whether the reserves could be used to move the crops and I answered him "yes," I did not hear the question. I thought, as I have stated, that he had reference to the line of deposits. After arguing for an hour that the reserves could not be used for any other purpose except the purposes to which they were dedicated by law, I could hardly admit that reserves could be loaned out to the people who were procuring discounts in the banks.

What I want to do is this: I want to have this colloquy in the RECORD, and with it I desire to have printed the provisions of the banking law, kindly furnished to me by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], from section 92, on page 24 of the national banking laws, to section 105, inclusive. This includes all the provisions in reference to the reserves, so that we all may know exactly for what purpose the reserves may be used.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Maryland for permission to print in the RECORD the matter referred to by him is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

92. LAWS GOVERNING CERTAIN ASSOCIATIONS. (SEC. 5157.) The provisions of chapters two, three, and four [three, five, and seven of this edition] of this title, which are expressed without restrictive words, as applying to "national banking association," or to "associations," apply to all associations organized to carry on the business of banking under any act of Congress.

93. PLACE OF BUSINESS. (SEC. 5190.) The usual business of each national banking association shall be transacted at an office or banking house located in the place specified in its organization certificate.

94. RESERVE CITIES AND RESERVE REQUIREMENTS. (SEC. 5191.) Every national banking association in either of the following cities: Albany, Baltimore, Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Louisville, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, St. Louis, San Francisco, and Washington shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least twenty-five per centum of the aggregate amount of its deposits in all respects; and every other association shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least fifteen per centum of the aggregate amount of its deposits in all respects. (See paragraphs 104 and 105.)

95. RESERVE NOT MAINTAINED. (SEC. 5191.) Whenever the lawful money of any association in any of the cities named shall be below the amount of twenty-five per centum of its deposits, and whenever the lawful money of any other association shall be below fifteen per centum of its deposits, such association shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividend of its profits until the required proportion between the aggregate amount of its deposits and its lawful money of the United States has been restored. And the Comptroller of the Currency may notify any association, whose lawful-money reserve shall be below the amount above required to be kept on hand, to make good such reserve; and if such association shall fail for thirty days thereafter so to make good its reserve of lawful money, the Comptroller may, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, appoint a receiver to wind up the business of the association, as provided in section fifty-two hundred and thirty-four.

96. RESERVE AGENTS' BALANCES COUNTED AS RESERVE. (SEC. 5192.) Three-fifths of the reserve of fifteen per centum required by the preceding section to be kept may consist of balances due to an association from associations approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, organized under the act of June three, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, or under this title, and doing business in the cities of Albany, Baltimore, Boston, Charleston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Louisville, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Richmond, St. Louis, San Francisco, and Washington.

97. CLEARING-HOUSE CERTIFICATES COUNTED AS RESERVE.—Clearing-house certificates, representing specie or lawful money specially deposited for that purpose, of any clearing-house association shall also be deemed to be lawful money in the possession of any association belonging to such clearing house, holding and owning such certificate, within the preceding section.

98. REDEMPTION FUND COUNTED AS RESERVE.—Sec. 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, provides that the five per cent redemption fund, which shall at all times be kept on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, shall be counted as a part of the lawful reserve.

99. UNITED STATES NOTE CERTIFICATES COUNTED AS RESERVE. (SEC. 5193.) The Secretary of the Treasury may receive United States notes on deposit, without interest, from any national banking association, in sums of not less than ten thousand dollars, and issue certificates therefor in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of not less than five thousand dollars, and payable on demand in United States notes at the place where the deposits were made. The notes so deposited shall not be counted as part of the lawful-money reserve of the association; but the certificates issued therefor may be counted as part of its lawful-money reserve, and may be accepted in the settlement of clearing-house balances at the places where the deposits therefor were made. (Repealed March 14, 1900.)

100. REDEMPTION OF SUCH CERTIFICATES. (SEC. 5194.) The power conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by the preceding section shall not be exercised so as to create any expansion or contraction of the currency; and United States notes for which certificates are issued under that section, or other United States notes of like amount, shall be held as special deposits in the Treasury and used only for redemption of such certificates.

101. UNITED STATES GOLD CERTIFICATES COUNTED AS RESERVE.—Sec. 12 of the act of July 12, 1882, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer or assistant treasurers of the United States, in sums of not less than twenty dollars, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than twenty dollars each, corresponding with the denominations of United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. Said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and such certificates, as also silver certificates, when held by any national banking association, shall be counted as part of its lawful reserve; and no national banking association shall be a member of any clearing house in which such certificates shall not be receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below one hundred millions of dollars; and the provisions of section fifty-two hundred and seven of the Revised Statutes shall be applicable to the certificates herein authorized and directed to be issued.

102. RESERVE REQUIREMENTS FOR GOLD BANKS. (SEC. 5186.) Every association organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold shall at all times keep on hand not less than twenty-five per centum of its outstanding circulation, in gold or silver coin of the United States, and shall receive at par in the payment of debts the gold notes of every other such association which at the time of such payment is redeeming its circulating notes in gold coin of the United States, and shall be subject to all the provisions of this title: Provided, That, in applying the same to associations organized for issuing gold notes, the terms "lawful money" and "lawful money of the United States" shall be construed to mean gold or silver coin of the United States; and the circulation of such association shall not be within the limitation of circulation mentioned in this title.

103. RESERVE DEPOSIT IN CENTRAL RESERVE CITY. (SEC. 5195.) Each association organized in any of the cities named in section fifty-one hundred and ninety-one may keep one-half of its lawful-money reserve in cash deposits in the city of New York. But the foregoing provision shall not apply to associations organized and located in the city of San Francisco for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold. This section shall not relieve any association from its liability to redeem its circulating notes at its own counter at par in lawful money on demand.

104. ADDITIONAL RESERVE CITIES.—Sec. 1 of the act of March 3, 1887, as amended by the act of March 3, 1903, provides that whenever three-fourths in number of the national banks located in any city of the United States having a population of twenty-five thousand people shall make application to the Comptroller of the Currency, in writing, asking that the name of the city in which such banks are located shall be added to the cities named in sections fifty-one hundred and ninety-one and fifty-one hundred and ninety-two of the Revised Statutes, the Comptroller shall have authority to grant such request, and every bank located in such city shall at all times thereafter have on hand in lawful money of the United States an amount equal to at least twenty-five per centum of its deposits, as provided in sections fifty-one hundred and ninety-one and fifty-one hundred and ninety-five of the Revised Statutes.

105. ADDITIONAL CENTRAL RESERVE CITIES.—Sec. 2 of the act of March 3, 1887, provides that whenever three-fourths in number of the national banks located in any city of the United States having a population of two hundred thousand people shall make application to the Comptroller of the Currency, in writing, asking that such city may be a central reserve city, like the city of New York, in which one-half of the lawful-money reserve of the national banks located in other reserve cities may be deposited, as provided in section fifty-one hundred and ninety-five of the Revised Statutes, the Comptroller shall have authority, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to grant such request, and every bank located in such city shall at all times thereafter have on hand in lawful money of the United States twenty-five per centum of its deposits, as provided in section fifty-one hundred and ninety-one of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. RAYNER. Before proceeding further I want to give the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] a statement made by the Comptroller of the Currency in reference to these reserves. Here is what the Comptroller says:

It will thus be seen that the country bank keeps but 6 per cent on hand in cash, and of the country bank's reserve deposits the city banks keep but 1.4 per cent on hand in cash. There is therefore but 7.4 per cent of cash, or $740,625, kept unloaned anywhere against this deposit of $10,000,000 in the country banks. Of this but $140,625 is outside the country bank's own vaults. If, therefore, there is a reduction in the deposits of the country banks of $150,000 out of $10,000,000, or only 1½ per cent, it calls for more cash or reserve money than has been kept on hand for the whole $10,000,000 in the reserve banks.

Is it any wonder, then, that the demand in the fall for about $200,000,000 in currency for crop moving always makes a disturbance and that when this demand was accompanied by withdrawal of deposits and a curtailment of credits, caused by uneasiness and distrust, that the banks were forced in self-defense to partially suspend payments, adopt clearing-house certificates, and various other expedients to furnish currency to meet such an emergency?

I have not the slightest idea in the world that this money could be loaned out for the purpose of discounting the paper of the bank's customers. My idea about this reserve is this—and if I am making a mistake, I shall be very glad to be corrected—the reserve is held as a reserve to secure the line of deposits; but I believe that in case of an emergency the reserves have been used to pay the depositors. If I am wrong about that, I will submit to the experience of the Senator from Rhode Island upon that question.

I believe that in the case of an emergency the reserve can be used to pay depositors. If the depositor then chooses to use the reserve to move the crops, that is for him to say. Of course the reserve could not be used for the purpose of discounting notes to move the crops; but I have always been of the opinion and am now—and I am fortified in the opinion by several of the most experienced bankers—that in the case of an emergency the reserves have been used for the purpose of paying the depositors.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the reserve can undoubtedly be used in the case of an emergency to meet any demand obligation of the bank. That is what reserves are for; they are for nothing else; but the law requires that, if so used, they shall be immediately replaced; that a certain percentage shall be maintained, and that, in the absence of such percentage being maintained, the Comptroller of the Currency can, if the reserve is not restored in thirty days, throw the bank into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. RAYNER. That is under the thirty days' limitation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Under the thirty days' limitation.

Mr. RAYNER. Then, I submit that the Senator from Minnesota must have been wrong and the Senator from Texas must have been right when the Senator from Minnesota said yesterday:

It seems to me—certainly my understanding is—that if a bank in the country had a reserve in its vault it could not have used a dollar of that reserve without violating the law.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to say now that as the law reads, not as it may be interpreted by a Comptroller of the Currency, if all of the reserve is in the bank's vault, it can not be used without violating the law, assuming, of course, that it is down to the point of that reserve when it dips into the reserve.

Mr. RAYNER. It can not be used for any purpose at all?

Mr. CLAPP. For any purpose without violating the law requiring that reserve. It is true that, recognizing that the law will be perhaps ignored in a great emergency, the law does provide that, if this reserve is disturbed, it must be made good within thirty days. If it is left to the banker to say when and for what he will proceed to use that reserve, then I say that there is no warrant for the assertion that the banker can use that reserve for one purpose without violating the law, but can not use it for another purpose without violating the law. The law makes no such distinction. Exigencies may warrant——

Mr. RAYNER. Then, the Senator from Minnesota does not agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that in case of emergency the reserve may be used to pay depositors?

Mr. CLAPP. Absolutely.

Mr. RAYNER. You do not agree with him?

Mr. CLAPP. I do agree with him.

Mr. RAYNER. You do agree with him?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly; on that proposition.

Mr. RAYNER. Then, what does the Senator do with section 5191 of the national banking act, which provides that, if the reserve is not maintained, in thirty days the Comptroller may take possession of the bank?

Mr. CLAPP. I say that, while the law contemplates the reserve shall be kept, if in stress of emergency, the banker does exceed his lawful authority in the use of the reserve, he must make it good within thirty days. I know of no better expression, perhaps, than to use the expression that the Comptroller may for a time and under certain conditions, of which he, perhaps, is alone to judge, be blind to a violation of the law. That is one reason why I do not believe in this legal reserve. I am just old-fashioned enough to believe that laws should be made to be obeyed, and that a law should not be made with the idea that any officer of the Government may, at his own pleasure, wink at a violation of it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. RAYNER. I have not concluded, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is rather unfortunate that the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Rhode Island each use the word "emergency" in connection with the right of a bank to pay the depositors, although the payment may reduce the amount of its reserve below 15 per cent of its deposits. Perhaps it may be said that an emergency has arisen in the case of that particular bank when it finds itself called upon by its depositors for more money than will leave intact its 15 per cent reserve; but it can not be supposed for a moment that the law contemplated that the bank would be authorized to suspend cash payment as long as it had cash in its vaults. All that means, and all that it was intended to mean is simply this, that when the reserve of a bank has been reduced to 15 per cent of its deposits, that bank must suspend the discounting of paper and the negotiation of loans; but it is still left free to discharge its obligations to each depositor as that depositor applies. The law, very properly recognizing that depositors may take from the bank enough to reduce its reserve below 15 per cent, requires that when a bank's reserve has been so reduced it must be repaired within thirty days. That is the whole of what it means. It is not merely the right of a bank to use its reserve in an emergency. It is the right and the duty of a bank to use that reserve whenever a depositor calls for his balance or any part of it, even though it falls below 15 per cent of the deposits.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The Senator from Texas, Mr. President, I take it, will admit that the law requires the banks to hold 15 per cent of their deposits as a reserve. Now, will the Senator from Texas point to any affirmative authority of law that authorizes a bank to reduce its reserve below the legal limit?

Mr. BAILEY. No; Mr. President, but that is not necessary in view of the express obligation upon the bank to pay every depositor as he calls for his money. You must construe the duty of the bank under the law not only to itself, but to its depositors, and surely, whenever a bank suspends cash payment its depositors would have the right to call upon the Comptroller to put it into the hands of an examiner.

These two duties can be performed without any conflict. The bank can meet and discharge its obligations to the depositor by paying cash when the depositor calls for it, and when the bank, in meeting that obligation to the depositor, has paid out cash until its reserve falls below 15 per cent of its deposits, it then becomes the duty of the bank to repair that reserve by calling in from the people who owe it the loans which it has extended to its customers.

I should dislike very much to see it announced in the Senate and accepted by the country that whenever a banker had paid his depositors until he had but 15 per cent of the deposits left he could look a man in the face and say, "Under the law of the United States I am not permitted to pay you your money. You must wait until I have collected from those who owe me, and then, when I have more than 15 per cent, I will pay you."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BAILEY. When I finish this sentence. I think all the law intended to do was to say to the banker, "When you have reached the 15 per cent limit you have no option or discretion as to discounting paper or making further loans." I think that is all the law intended.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I have no objection to this interruption, but these speeches are not my speech.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Maryland can very well afford to allow this interruption to appear as part of his speech, because it would be a very grave mistake for it to be generally asserted and accepted here that a banker is under a higher obligation to maintain his reserve than to pay his depositors.

Mr. RAYNER. I was not referring to the Senator from Texas. I was referring to the speech the Senator from Minnesota wants to make.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have said all I desire to say, and I will say to the Senator from Maryland that we are only responsible for what we say ourselves—but I was not willing to remain in my seat and hear it stated and accepted that the bank need not pay its depositors when its reserve had fallen below 15 per cent. I merely wanted to express my own opinion that the provision of law is intended to limit the right of the bank to discount paper, but not to pay depositors.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I had supposed the Senator from Maryland had concluded, or I would not have made so long a statement as I did, and I will not unduly prolong it now; but at the proper time I shall trespass upon the patience of the Senate to discuss this very proposition of the reserves. At this time I merely want to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to what the Senator from Florida drew as an inference, and what I drew as an inference, and, I am inclined to think, what other Senators drew as an inference, from his speech yesterday with reference to the question of bank reserves. He was discussing this question, and, referring to the fact that part of the reserves were retained in the country banks and part of them went to the city banks, and then, on page 1959, near the close of the debate, he used this language:

> You talk to me about moving the crops. Where is the $200,000,000 to come from to move the crops? The country banks have only 6 per cent of their reserve.

He did not say in that connection that if they had 15 per cent reserve they could have used it for moving the crops. That is very true; but in making the inquiry, "Where is the money to move the crops to come from?" he makes the further suggestion that "the country banks have only got 6 per cent of their reserve." I submit that, using the expression that they only had 6 per cent of their reserve in connection with the very inquiry as to where the $200,000,000 was to come from, left us at liberty to draw the deduction that he did hold that this reserve could be used if the entire 15 per cent was there for moving the crops. If he did not mean that, I certainly am glad of the explanation, for that was the deduction I drew.

Mr. RAYNER. I want to say to the Senator from Minnesota that not only I did not mean it, but I could not have meant it, and his construction of my language is wrong. If the Senator will read the whole sentence he will see that I was referring to the money conditions of the country. I just brought in the amount of the reserves of the country banks with it. I was arguing, and am arguing now, that the bank reserve must be dedicated to the purpose defined by law. I had been arguing for half an hour that the reserve must be dedicated to the purpose that the law provides. The object that I had in view was to change the next section. Three-fifths of the reserve, or the 15 per cent required by the preceding section to be kept, may consist of "balances due to the association from associations approved by the Comptroller of the Currency."

That section was the text of my argument yesterday, and I answered the question of the Senator from Florida as I did because I thought he had reference to the deposits and not the reserves. I desire to be perfectly understood upon this question, because there can not be any controversy about it. I agree with every word the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has said, but I do not agree with what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has said. I believe, however, that the reserves are for a certain purpose, and they can not be used for any other purpose under the law, but I want the sections I have indicated set out in the RECORD so that all of us can understand exactly what the reserves are for, as the law is very plain upon the subject.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. RAYNER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the Senator from Maryland asked me a question, and the answer which I gave does not seem to be satisfactory to my friend, the Senator from Texas, I would like to make a statement of my own position and understanding about this matter.

The whole theory of the national banking act is that the bank should have its resources in such a condition at all times that it should be able to respond to all demands for payment of any of its demand obligations without infringing upon its reserve; in other words, an amount equal to 15 per cent of the deposits is set apart as a reserve, and it is contemplated that all the ordinary business of the bank could be conducted without touching that reserve, and that any infringement upon that reserve to the extent to which it is depleted is in a sense a violation of the law. That the bank should meet its demand obligations in the case of emergency by using that reserve is unquestionable, but when the condition of the bank otherwise does not permit it to meet its demand obligations by the ordinary method it may encroach upon the reserve. The theory, however, is that the bank should be at all times in condition to meet its demands without infringing upon the reserve, and the law says plainly that when the time comes when that reserve is infringed upon no additional loans shall be made. The bank then has no right to make any further loans, and if it refuses or declines or is unable to maintain that reserve, or to restore it within thirty days, then a receiver is to be appointed and the bank be taken possession of. So that, while there is no question but that the reserves are put there to be used in case of emergency or of unusual circumstances, they are not put there to be used in the ordinary business of the banks and can not be used unless there is an emergency.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the only difference between the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and myself is that he persists in using the words "in an emergency." I insist that the reserve is there to meet, not a demand arising out of an emergency, but a demand that arises in the ordinary and daily course of business. In other words, the law wisely recognizes that it is apt to happen that depositors, one in seven, from day to day and from time to time, may call for their deposits, and it is not safe banking for any bank to allow its available cash to run below the relation of 1 to 7. The very purpose of the reserve is——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Recognizing now, as all bankers do, the principle which the Senator has just stated, is it not true that the word "emergency" is the right word to use there, because it is an emergency in that bank? If the rule which the Senator has announced has been violated, and they have reached a point where, in order to meet the demands of the depositors, they have to go into the reserve that is set aside in the bank, is not that an emergency?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all, Mr. President. There are very few banks that generally keep more than the law requires. It is not profitable banking to do so. The usual and ordinary practice is for a bank to loan down close to the red line, and then, if somebody comes for a loan, the banker very properly says, "under the law I am unable to accommodate you, because I am not above my reserve limit." No matter how gilt-edged a note may be offered for negotiation, the bank is bound to decline it, and if it chooses to give its customers any explanation, all accept that as a sufficient reason for refusing them a loan. But never can it happen that a bank can excuse itself for refusing to pay a depositor by saying, "I have reached the reserve limit." He does not need to wait for an emergency, unless, indeed, it be that an emergency in the case of that particular bank is reached when its reserve falls below 15 per cent. If the term "emergency" could be used in that sense, then I have no objection to it; but really it is without meaning, because the ordinary and usual business of a bank is to keep its reserve at only about the limit which the law requires.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. One moment, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

The very law which requires the reserve to be repaired within thirty days when once it is impaired is itself a permission by implication to impair. I do not construe that as a permission to impair the reserve by discounting paper or making loans. I construe that simply as a recognition in the law that under the law the bank may in some cases fall below its reserve in order to meet the daily demand of its depositors. I repeat that I would regard it as unfortunate for the country and the people generally to have it announced that a banker could only trench upon his reserve to pay his depositors in an extraordinary crisis or in an emergency. The very purpose of that reserve is not to hold it in idleness, but it is to have it there to meet the demands which may come from the depositors any day. We are now trying in the bill under consideration to provide for an emergency; but surely the Senator from Rhode Island does not mean that the emergency which he describes with reference to the reserve is the same kind of an emergency which he is trying to meet and prevent by this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Texas intimate that there is anybody here who claims that a bank should not use its reserve to pay its demand obligations whenever the occasion requires?

Mr. BAILEY. No; but they couple that demand with a qualification that it can only be done in an emergency, and I contend that that qualification has no place either as a matter of law or as a matter of practice.

Now I will be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Texas whether, as a matter of fact, the clearing houses of our country do not in their rules provide that the banks shall keep at least 25 per cent of this money in reserve, and whether it is not a rule of banking generally throughout the country that whenever the reserve reaches a point below 25 per cent it is nearing the danger point? As a matter of fact, is it not an emergency when the bank's reserve reaches a point below 15 per cent? Is not that such an emergency as is contemplated in this bill, which would entitle the bank immediately to call for currency under this so-called "Aldrich bill?"

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that might not follow, and I want to say that it has happened an almost unlimited number of times that banks have reached the positive limit of their reserves without themselves considering or being considered by their customers to be in any great difficulty or in any great emergency. It is not an uncommon thing in the city of New York for the bank statement to show the reserves below the legal requirement.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will not the Senator from Texas agree with me that, when the bank statement shows that the reserve is below the legal limit, that is a danger signal?

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Maryland—and I really supposed he had resumed his seat——

Mr. RAYNER. I want to fortify the Senator's statement, if he will permit me to do so—I have no desire to make a speech, but I want to fortify the Senator's statement by citing the fact which was constantly published in the papers during the panic that some of the New York banks were below their reserve. I am informed on this floor now by a Senator who is the president of a bank and knows more about practical banking perhaps than a number of us put together that the banks do not wait for an emergency, but are using their reserves for the purpose of paying depositors. Neither the Senator from Rhode Island nor the Senator from California can give us an example where a bank has ever been put into the hands of a receiver for temporarily using a small portion of its reserves in order to pay its depositors. If there is such a case I should like to hear of it. It was published every day in the papers that the New York banks were below the reserve. Why did not a receiver take possession of them under this section of the national bank law?

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me for just a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Illinois will permit me to conclude the sentence.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Maryland questioned whether a bank was ever put into the hands of a receiver for allowing its reserve to go below 15 per cent. I undertake to say that there can not be an instance found since national banks were inaugurated where the reserve has continued for thirty days below the legal limit. The deposits that are made from day to day put the reserve back to the legal limit.

The Senator from Texas says that to pay the depositor a bank may go below the reserve. In my judgment that is an emergency with that particular bank, and is permissible under the law, but if that bank permitted the reserve to remain below the legal limit for thirty days it would come within the limitation prescribed by the statute here, and the Comptroller would take charge of it if he enforced the law.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me ask the Senator from Illinois a question. The New York banks were below their reserves for sixty days. Did the Comptroller of the Treasury appoint receivers for any of those banks? That fact was published in the daily papers.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is not a record showing that they were below the legal limit for thirty days.

Mr. RAYNER. The papers published every day for sixty days the statement that they were below the limit.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am not responsible, nor is the Senator from Maryland responsible for what the papers publish, but I undertake to say that no national bank has ever remained below the reserve for thirty days continually.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I wish to say, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, that no case can be cited where a bank has ever been put into the hands of a receiver because of the depletion of its reserve——

Mr. RAYNER. I did not say that.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. What did you say?

Mr. RAYNER. I said they have used the reserve to pay depositors without waiting for an emergency; that the Comptroller of the Currency does not always put a bank in the hands of a receiver if it uses its reserve to pay depositors.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understood the Senator from Maryland to challenge the Senator from Rhode Island to cite an instance where a bank had been put into the hands of a receiver for falling below the legal reserve. I challenge the Senator from Maryland to cite an instance where a bank has been put into the hands of a receiver which has not fallen below the legal reserve.

Mr. RAYNER. That is illogical. If a bank is put in the hands of a receiver, the chances are largely that it has fallen below its legal reserve. But I say that it has not been put there always upon that ground. There are plenty of other grounds. What does the Senator say to the financial reports published day after day that the New York banks, during the late crisis, were below their legal reserve?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I have nothing to say as to the manner in which the Comptroller of the Currency discharges his duty under the law. I am speaking now to the question of reserves as suggested by the Senator from Maryland, and when he extended that challenge I merely wanted to extend one to him in return.

Mr. RAYNER. You ought to have accepted the challenge without extending another challenge.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The challenge was not addressed to me, Mr. President. If it had been, I should perhaps have treated it with the same silence that the Senator from Rhode Island did. But it is a fact that, however these banks are managed, when they go into the hands of a receiver it is because the reserve has been exhausted, for when the reserve is there of course the bank does business.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, this illustrates perfectly what I have been contending for. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] declares that no bank has been put into the hands of a receiver for paying out money below its reserve. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] says—and I think he is most probably accurate in that—that no bank was ever put into the hands of a receiver until and unless it had fallen below its legal reserve. Now, that only illustrates that a bank may fall below its reserve without being in an emergency, while other banks in an emergency repeatedly do fall below their legal reserve. To my mind it illustrates the danger of leaving this statement to stand, that a bank can use its reserve only to pay its depositors "in an emergency."

Now, to return to the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island that a serious deficiency in a reserve, or rather, to repeat his statement accurately first, I will grant you that to fall below the reserve may be a danger signal. To seriously fall below it is certainly a sign of distress. If a bank or a number of associated banks should be barely below the reserve, I should feel no apprehension about the state of the country, and I should not expect any serious financial crisis. But if that same bank or those same associated banks were to suffer an enormous diminution of their lawful and proper reserve, I would think that not only the banks themselves were involved, but that the country was to suffer from the same cause.

If the Senator means an emergency which only relates to the bank and he is willing to say that whenever any bank has paid out its cash to its reserve line it is in an emergency, I will not quarrel about that description of a bank's condition, although I still maintain that many a bank in this country heretofore and many a bank in this country hereafter, perfectly solvent and without a question about its ability to pay, has paid and will pay below the reserve limit, and then, if it is conducted according to law, it will immediately take steps to repair that reserve by receiving deposits or making collections and making no loans until the reserve has been restored.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for having detained it in this perhaps unnecessary colloquy, and I beg the pardon of the Senator from Maryland. I did not, when I took the floor, intend to take him off of it. I only rose to make a correction, which ought to have occupied only two minutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to the fact that the use of the word "reserve" implies additional power in any sense in which it is used. It is a word of reservation; of a reserve force. We speak of the reserve force of an individual. Is the individual not to draw on that reserve force when his ordinary or usable force is expended? Is an army not to call to the line of battle its reserves when the army is pressed? Are the banks of the United States not to call upon their financial reserves when their ordinary credit is pressed? The lawmaker recognized that in the very language of this section a reserve is something which is held back for use under certain contingencies, either expressed, understood, or implied. If you will take the word in any sense where it is analyzed and applied you will find that is its scope and meaning. Had the legislators intended otherwise they would have said that no bank shall pay out or deplete its fund of currency below a certain percentage. But on the face of the statute the prohibition in the case of reserves is expressed in these words, and I read from section 95, on page 24:

> Whenever the lawful money of any other association shall be below 15 per cent of its deposits, such association shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividend of its profits until the required proportion between the aggregate amount of its deposits and its lawful money of the United States has been restored.

That is a complete statement of a legal proposition in itself. It stands alone. They shall not do those things when the reserves are below 25 or 15 per cent of the money in the bank. The law does not say, either directly or by implication, that they shall not pay their depositors when the reserve falls below 15 or 25 per cent, but it does imply in the next paragraph of this section that that is just what they are to use the reserve for—to enable them to perform the ordinary obligation which they are under when they take the money of a depositor into their keeping.

It is the depositors' money, not the bank's, and the bank may use the reserve at any time for the payment of its depositors, provided that it shall not even for that purpose maintain a less reserve than that required to be kept by law. It could not be written plainer in the statute in any elaboration which might be attempted. That is not only the law, but the practice of banks. As has been said by the Senator from Texas, there is no obligation upon the part of the banks not to deplete their cash on hand below 15 or 25 per cent by the payment of their depositors. It was the intention of the law that such should be the case. As I said, the reserves may be called into action just as the reserve corps of an army may be called into action in time of need. The reserve in the vaults of a bank may be called into action for a limited purpose. The statute in this prohibition eliminates every other function of banking except that of paying depositors. It says they shall not do those usual things that are done for profit, and they shall not divide any profits while their reserves are below the legal requirement, but they are not prohibited from meeting the obligation of returning to the depositor the money which he has entrusted to them, without interest, for safe-keeping.

The amendment I offered on the 9th day of January, which is on the table, is intended to cover that contingency, requiring the banks to keep actual reserves instead of fictitious reserves. Of what value is it in the case of a run upon a bank in Iowa that has three-fifths of its reserves in a bank in New York City? The bank in New York City is not prohibited from using the three-fifths of the reserve which the Iowa bank has on deposit with it. So far as the depositors of the Iowa bank are concerned, the New York bank has given no security to the Iowa depositors. Do you mean to say that the bank in Iowa is required to keep 15 per cent of its individual deposits on hand as a reserve, and then by a subsequent unwise provision in the law is allowed to take three-fifths of the 15 per cent and deposit it with another reserve bank in New York, and that the depositors of the Iowa bank were intended to be left uncovered to the extent of the three-fifths? Is the depositor in the bank in Iowa to be left first unprotected to the extent of three-fifths of the reserve held for his protection that has been sent to a distant money market, and then unprotected by the actual reserve which is held in the vaults of the bank in Iowa so that it is at no time available to him or to make good the obligations of the bank?

For what purpose is the reserve intended to be held? For whose benefit? If it can not be used to pay the depositors, it can only be for the benefit of the stockholders in the bank. Does the law intend to protect the stockholders in the bank to the exclusion of the depositors in the bank? The stockholders of a bank pay in their money on the stock they purchase for the purpose of entitling them to do business with other people's money without paying them interest for it. They are entitled to the last consideration, not the first. The depositor, who is the real owner of the money, is entitled to the first consideration, and the law intended that the depositor should have it.

So, giving the right interpretation to the word "reserve," then, of course, the reserve held by the bank belongs at all times to the depositors; and the law never intended, if it had a right to do it, to abrogate the contract that is made between the depositor and the bank when the depositor places his money in the bank. The law can not and never intended to say that under any circumstances, so long as the doors of the banks are open and there is a dollar of deposits in its vaults, the man who has deposited his money there is not entitled to go there and get it to the very last dollar of cash held by the bank, because he is the owner of every dollar, so far as the question is between himself and the bank, of any money that may be in its vaults. The whole controversy seems to have arisen out of an incomplete understanding or consideration of the nature, character, and purpose of the reserves of lawful money held by the banks.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I am not a banker, but my understanding of this question is that when the reserves were created it was for a wise purpose, and that when a bank reached the limits of its reserves it was admonished that beyond that it could not make loans and must then and there stop loaning. But the law recognizes that it is perfectly legal and proper and just, and it is the practice of the banks, so long as they have any money, to pay their depositors, no matter if they exhaust the reserve, and if at the end of thirty days, after notice from the Comptroller, the reserve is not made good, the bank is taken in charge and put into the hands of a receiver. That seems to me to be the law of the case. During the recent crisis in New York a great banker, one of the heads of the greatest bank in the United States, was called upon and admonished that his reserve was down to 10 per cent. He said, "Yes; that is all right. What is the reserve for? As long as this bank has any money it will pay it out to its depositors and pay its debts."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, my position with reference to this matter appears clearly, I think, in the excerpt from the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings which was read by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] preceding his remarks. Some portion of the remarks submitted yesterday on this particular point does not appear, however, in the RECORD, but if it did appear it would make even clearer my position with reference to the matter. I beg the indulgence of the Senate therefore to state it again briefly.

It is, Mr. President, as I said yesterday, the object and purpose of a bank reserve to meet such demands on the bank as might be made by its depositors. All of its deposits as a rule are demand obligations of the bank which must, if the law is followed, be met promptly by the payment of money over the counter. The amount of 15 per cent was probably named in the statute because in the course of banking and in the experience of bankers it was considered that that amount would in all probability meet any occasion which might arise to pay out an unusual sum to depositors. The obligation of a bank to pay its depositors is not affirmatively stated in the law, it is true, but it arises from the very relationship of a bank to its depositors. There is an implied obligation which the law raises when this relationship is created that the bank shall pay its deposits which are subject to demand promptly and immediately in money.

Something has been said—and this law has been read—which implies that there are other contingencies in which the reserve may be trenched upon. But I do not believe any Senator has pointed out specifically the case in which that may occur. So, Mr. President, I will read:

> Whenever the lawful money of any other association shall be below 15 per cent of its deposits, such association shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise—

And this is the exception—

> otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight.

In other words, Mr. President, here is an express provision of law authorizing the banks to trench upon the reserve for the purpose of discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight. In the first place, therefore, there is an implied authority arising out of the very relationship between banks and their depositors, as well as from the nature of the reserve and the purpose of its creation, for trenching upon the reserve for the payment of deposits, and in the next place there is a specific authorization of the statute for trenching upon the reserve in discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight.

I beg the indulgence of the Senate a moment to go further and say that this provision of the law respecting the reserve was intended to protect depositors, and while there is a suggestion here and there that this law ought to be repealed, or rather remain as at present modified, I submit to those gentlemen that when the banks, so far as the country banks are concerned, are authorized to loan 85 per cent of the money belonging to their depositors, they ought not to complain if they are required to keep 15 per cent of their deposits in the banks ready to meet depositors, if they should demand their money. That is the question for the Senate to determine when it comes to that matter—whether there shall not be put into the law some provision to further protect the depositors at least to the extent of 15 per cent of their deposits in country banks and 25 per cent in other banks.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Texas to contend that the bank ought always to meet demand obligations, and that the law which requires it to do it is really superior to a law which requires it to keep a reserve, and that it is the highest obligation of a bank at all times. That, I believe, is the contention of every Senator on this floor. I think I have heard no dissent from that statement, and all this discussion upon terms, as to whether an emergency exists or whether an unusual condition exists, is entirely aside from the real question before the Senate. Nobody denies the obligation of a bank to pay its demand obligations. Nobody has questioned that. And if it is necessary to use the reesrve, it can be used. But that does not touch the question of the wisdom of requiring the banks—and that is what I understand the Senator from Texas is now contending for—to keep a reserve which can be used, and will be used, under unusual conditions.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not know that I go to the extent that the Senator from Rhode Island does. The law says that the country banks shall keep in the banks, as a reserve, 15 per cent of their deposits, and I believe that the primary purpose of that law is to protect depositors.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably.

Mr. CULBERSON. I believe that this amount of money ought to be reserved in the banks because, among other things, it will tend to give confidence to depositors and enable the banks to meet any probable demand by them. I think the banks ought not to complain; I think they ought not to ask to be relieved from the necessity of setting apart 15 per cent and 25 per cent, and that they be permitted to loan it to New York banks and banks in other central reserve cities, congesting the money of the country in the centers, when the banks are already loaning 85 per cent and 75 per cent of their deposits, in so far as those deposits are represented in actual cash.

BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. "All witnesses subpœnaed and appearing for the Government and those appearing for the defense as above authorized, in the case mentioned in this paragraph, shall be paid out of said appropriations the per diem fees allowed by law to witnesses in other cases, together with actual, reasonable expense of travel incurred in coming from and returning to their places of residence, which said actual expense shall be sworn to and shall be subject to the inspection, revision, and approval of the court, and shall be in lieu of mileage now authorized by law to witnesses on other cases; and the tender of a sum sufficient to cover such actual expenses and the per diem fees shall be as effective for all purposes as the tender of mileage and per diem now allowed by law."

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have received the following letter from the Secretary of the Navy:

February 12, 1908.

SIR: The Navy Department has the honor to invite the attention of the Executive to the necessity for the enactment of legislation whereby the representatives of the Government may have such control of wireless telegraphy as will insure noninterference with official messages.

The Navy Department has, by order of the President, the control of the Government coast stations, but unofficial messages sent by these stations or by public vessels may be interfered with by other wireless stations operated either by commercial companies, with a legitimate object, or by irresponsible persons with malicious intent.

Frequent occasions have arisen to illustrate the possible consequences of wireless interference. On one occasion an important message to the President of the United States while embarked on a naval vessel was interfered with and held up for a considerable time by the workings of a commercial wireless station; and instances have occurred wherein the naval stations at Newport, Washington, and San Francisco have at different times been interfered with by persons operating with no serious object.

The recent international wireless-telegraph convention at Berlin, to which the United States was a party, deals only with "wireless telegraph stations open to public service between the coast and vessels at sea," and therefore does not take cognizance of stations operated by private individuals for other than public service. It may be noted, however, that article 8 of the convention requires that: "The working of the wireless telegraph stations shall be organized as far as possible in such manner as not to disturb the service of other wireless telegraph stations."

In view of the foregoing, the Navy Department recommends that such legislation be enacted as will insure freedom of official messages from interference. To accomplish this the law should make it a punishable offense:

(a) To originate or transmit a false message purporting to be official;

(b) To break in and interfere with any wireless station while it is transmitting an official message;

(c) To refuse to cease or fail to cease sending a private wireless message when called upon to do so by an operator having an official message to be sent.

It will be noted that the enactment of law of the nature proposed would never seriously interfere with the legitimate working of commercial wireless installations. The restrictions suggested are intended to apply particularly to times of peace. During war, it is contemplated that much more extensive prohibitions would be exercised, to be put into effect in the absence of legislation by Executive proclamation as a belligerent right.

I am, sir, with great respect,

V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

I cordially indorse all that is above stated and recommend the passage of such legislation as will accomplish the desired end.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 13, 1908.

FREE TRANSPORTATION OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 2982.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] desires to have action upon Senate bill 4260, which, I am assured, will incur no debate. I therefore ask unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business, to be resumed immediately after the consideration of that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside at the request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4260) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like the Senator in charge of the bill to state what class or what individuals are permitted to travel on passes or to receive them who are not already permitted to do so under existing law.

Mr. CLAPP. While the bill recites the former exceptions, the only difference between the pending bill and the present law is that so far as employees of railroads are concerned it includes superannuated, disabled, and furloughed employees. It also allows the railroads in the various parts of the country, where there is a general demand in some sections in the summer months and in the winter months in some other sections, to transport the men back and forth without charge. We have limited it and kept it right down germane to the one proposition of the employees of railroads.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is the change in regard to employees of railroads the only change?

Mr. CLAPP. It is the only change.

Mr. KEAN. That is the only change.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce will be stated.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "amended," to strike out the following:

By inserting after the proviso in said paragraph the following:

": Provided further, That the term 'employees' as used in this paragraph shall include furloughed, pensioned, and superannuated employees, persons who have become crippled or infirm in the service of any such common carrier, and ex-employees traveling for the purpose of entering the service of any such common carrier; and the term 'families' as used in this paragraph shall include the families of those persons named in this proviso, also the families of persons killed while in the service of any such common carrier, and also the remains of such person."

So as to read:

That paragraph 4 of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, be amended so that said paragraph as so amended will read as follows:

"No common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after January 1, 1907, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passengers, except to its employees and their families, its officers, agents, surgeons, physicians, and attorneys at law; to ministers of religion, traveling secretaries of railroad Young Men's Christian Associations, inmates of hospitals and charitable and eleemosynary institutions, and persons exclusively engaged in charitable and eleemosynary work; to indigent, destitute, and homeless persons, and to such persons when transported by charitable societies or hospitals, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation; to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, and boards of managers of such homes; to necessary caretakers of live stock, poultry, and fruit; to employees on sleeping cars, express cars, and to linemen of telegraph and telephone companies; to railway mail service employees, post-office inspectors, customs inspectors, and immigration inspectors; to newsboys on trains, baggage agents, witnesses attending any legal investigation in which the common carrier is interested, persons injured in wrecks, and physicians and nurses attending such persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 20, after the word "become," to strike out "crippled" and insert "disabled;" after the word "carrier," in line 21, to insert "and the remains of a person killed in the employment of a carrier," and on page 4, line 3, after the word "carrier," to strike out "and also the remains of such person," so as to read:

Provided, That this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the interchange of passes for the officers, agents, and employees of common carriers, and their families; nor to prohibit any common carrier from carrying passengers free with the object of providing relief in cases of general epidemic, pestilence, or other calamitous visitation: Provided further, That the term "employees" as used in this paragraph shall include furloughed, pensioned, and superannuated employees, persons who have become disabled or infirm in the service of any such common carrier, and the remains of a person killed in the employment of a carrier and ex-employees traveling for the purpose of entering the service of any such common carrier; and the term "families" as used in this paragraph shall include the families of those persons named in this proviso, also the families of persons killed while in the service of any such common carrier. Any common carrier violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and for each offense, on conviction, shall pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000, and any person, other than the persons excepted in this provision, who uses any such interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation, shall be subject to a like penalty. Jurisdiction of offenses under this provision shall be the same as that provided for offenses in an act entitled "An act to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States," approved February 19, 1903, and any amendment thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF LAPENE & FERRE.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY] desires to have a bill passed. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. McENERY. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2886) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late firm of Lapene & Ferre.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the legal representatives of Jules Lapene, late of New Orleans, La., deceased, and the legal representatives of Auguste Ferre, late of Pau, France, deceased, formerly partners in trade engaged in a general mercantile business in said city of New Orleans and State of Louisiana, under the firm name of Lapene & Ferre, to bring suit in the Court of Claims against the Government of the United States for the net proceeds of the sale, by the agents of the United States, of 179 bales of cotton, now in the Treasury of the United States, claimed to be the property of the firm of Lapene & Ferre.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF THE PENAL LAWS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I now call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2982) to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Section 198a was amended and then passed over. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to take up that section?

Mr. HEYBURN. An amendment was suggested by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN.] I do not know whether he intends to press the amendment or not. I would appeal to him that the amendment seems to the committee hardly necessary. It is a question as to shooting at the horse of a mail carrier. The Senator proposed to insert "any other instrument of carriage."

Mr. KEAN. I do not insist on the amendment. I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey withdraws the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I see the Senator from Georgia is in the Chamber.

Mr. BACON. I am very sorry the Senator does not see some one else besides myself.

Mr. FRYE. It is not necessary to have anybody else.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that the instruction given, when the bill was first read, that the existing law should be retained, has been complied with in the reprint. The reprint is a consolidation of the existing law.

Mr. BACON. Preserving the features which were formerly eliminated and which were reinserted in the reconstructed paragraphs.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; they are preserved; so that section 198 may be adopted and section 198a may be eliminated.

Mr. BACON. That eliminates 198a?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it eliminates 198a.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That was the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, and it was agreed to. The Senator from Idaho moves that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to be sure that we exactly understand the situation. The amendment was proposed and agreed to when the bill was read originally. It only remained to formulate the amendment, which consisted of recurring to existing law. Now, that was adopted; the RECORD shows it. It really remained to bring the existing law into the bill as reported in lieu of the section as it was originally printed in the bill, and the reprint to stand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At what point in the original bill does section 198a appear?

Mr. HEYBURN. It agrees with the amendment that was adopted. It is simply the formulation of an amendment which was adopted.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Georgia——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about it, the Chair would ask the Senator from Idaho whether the amendment 198a, agreed to yesterday, is to stay in the bill or go out.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it is to go out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. And 198 in the print is the section as amended.

Now, Mr. President, I would inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether he desires to insist upon any further objection to section 185, the status of which seems to be in some uncertainty. That was the section with reference to the carrying of mail relating to the cargo. No amendment was proposed and the section was just allowed to be passed over. I would inquire whether the Senator from Georgia desires to consider it further or to offer an amendment to section 185. I repeat, the status of it seems to be in some uncertainty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recur to section 198. He is of opinion that there is some misunderstanding about it on the part of the Senator from Idaho. The bill reported to the Senate on January 7, 1908, is the text of the bill that is being amended. Section 198, on page 24 of sections of the bill passed over to be taken up for further consideration, is not the same identically with section 198 in the bill reported by the committee. If the Senator wishes to adopt section 198 among the sections passed over, it will, in the opinion of the Chair, be necessary to offer it as an amendment to the original text.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will offer as an amendment to section 198, as passed over, section 198 as contained in the reprint.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 198, on page 102, and to insert as section 198 the following:

SEC. 198. Whoever shall rob any carrier, agent, or other person intrusted with the mail, of such mail, or any part thereof, shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten years; and if convicted a second time of a like offense, or if, in effecting such robbery the first time, the robber shall wound the person having custody of the mail, or put his life in jeopardy by the use of a dangerous weapon, he shall be imprisoned for life.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I now move to insert after section 198, as just adopted, section 198a, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho moves an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment just agreed to it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 198a. Whoever shall attempt to rob the mail by assaulting the person having custody thereof, shooting at him or his horse, or threatening him with a dangerous weapon, and shall not effect such robbery, shall be imprisoned not less than two nor more than ten years.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I now desire to recur to section 185, and to ask the Senator from Georgia if he desires further consideration of that section? The section, I will say, was informally passed over.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that we spent a good deal of time yesterday in considering this section and I presumed had arrived at a conclusion mutually satisfactory; and, unless the Senator from Georgia has some amendment to propose, I should like the RECORD to show that the section is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not willing that the section shall be adopted in its present shape. I said to the Senator yesterday that, if he insisted upon it, I should have to ask the Senate to determine between us in regard to that matter. My only purpose in making that statement is that I think the section as it now stands will certainly work manifest injustice to all carriers unless it is disregarded.

The colleague of the Senator on yesterday read an opinion from one of the Attorneys-General construing this law in such a way that there would be no injustice done. That construction was, in my opinion, based upon an utter disregard of the language of the law as it is now written. I said to the Senator from Idaho that I would be perfectly content if this section was so recast that it would in fact express what the opinion of the Attorney-General said he thought it did express; in other words, I simply wish that the section shall be put in the shape that the Attorney-General construes it now to be in.

The language of the statute as it is now found in the books and as it is proposed to be reenacted in this revision expressly limits the right of the common carrier. I use the words "railroad company," though of course I think it refers to any other kind of common carriers. The statute expressly limits the railroad company—using that term as representative of all common carriers—in the sending of any letter or packet, to letters or packets which shall relate to the business of the particular train upon which that packet or letter is sent, or to some article which is being carried by that particular train. The opinion of the Attorney-General, quoting one of the regulations of the Post-Office Department, expands that to mean practically anything which relates to the business of the company. The opinion of the Attorney-General goes on to say that Congress, in the enactment of the law, intended to exclude the business of others, but did not have reference to the business of the railroads. I am stating substantially, I think, and with reasonable accuracy, what was said by the Attorney-General in construing this section. I said yesterday, and I repeat, that it is impossible that this language can properly be construed to mean any such thing, it being expressly limited, as I said before, to the train upon which the letter or packet is carried, or to some certain business of that train, or to some article carried on that train. That language is too explicit, too definite, too exact to make it possibly mean any other business of the railroad company. I am not desirous that the railroads should have any advantage in this matter to the extent suggested by the Senator on yesterday, or that they should be allowed privileges not allowed to other people, or that they should have any of their letter mail carried free. Therefore I am perfectly content, not that it should go to the extent suggested by the Attorney-General of including all their own business and only excluding the business of others, but that it should be limited to their current daily business in the operation and maintenance of their road or of other common carriers with interests similar to theirs.

While I do not entirely go to the extent of favoring the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], proposing to insert the words "for compensation," I would still be content with that, though it may be a little too broad, because it would enable the carriers not only to send all of their own communications, but those of anybody else, if they chose to take it free. I think there is an objection to that, but not as much objection as there is to the present words of the law, because I do not think that that would be very much availed of by the railroad companies.

But I shall ask, Mr. President, that the provision be so amended that the railroad companies shall have the right to do that which it is an absolute necessity they shall do—a necessity so great that the Post-Office Department in issuing the order has construed the language of the law to mean exactly the opposite of what it says, and so great that a former Attorney-General of the United States, great lawyer as he is, recognizing the necessity, has construed the words into a meaning that can not possibly be defended. I am only asking that the law be put in such shape as the Attorney-General has construed it to mean.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the law exists now as the committee have reported it, and if you just drop it out of consideration in connection with this code it would leave the railroad companies where they now stand.

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I submit to the Senator from Georgia the proposition that no amendment to this law has been submitted for consideration covering the objections of the Senator. So the committee is rather helpless.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary, if the Senator will pardon me for an interruption, there is pending here an amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood that amendment was not pressed; but it does not affect the question suggested by the Senator from Georgia. I presume that, unless some amendment is offered, this section will have to be dealt with as it stands, it being existing law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is pending.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am ready to consider that amendment, but the Senator from Colorado seems not to be in the Chamber at the moment, and I think we had better pass the section over. But unless some amendment is proposed to it, it will be necessary either to drop it out of the code or else let the existing law stand.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Oregon will pardon me a moment, I will state that I have not proposed any amendment because I gathered the impression from what occurred yesterday in a conversation I had with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that possibly an amendment would be proposed by those representing the committee after the matter has been discussed as it has been.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I do not wish unduly to interrupt the Senator from Idaho, but I wish to request that the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] may be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, line 12, after the word "carry," it is proposed to insert "for compensation," so that if amended it will read:

Or conveyance of any kind which regularly perform trips at stated periods on any post route, or from any city, town, or place to any other city, town, or place between which the mail is regularly carried, and which shall carry for compensation, otherwise than in the mail, any letters or packets, etc.

Mr. FULTON. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is probably a little too broad. It would allow a company to engage in business that would be unnecessary for it to engage in the conduct of its own particular business or business relating to the railway line.

I suggest to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who brought the question up, that if in line 12, after the word "vessel," there were inserted the words "or to the management or conduct thereof," and in line 14, after the word "vehicle," there were inserted the words "or to the management or conduct of such railway, stagecoach, or other vehicle," I think that would cover the objection of the Senator. Am I taking too much of the time of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly not.

Mr. FULTON. I think that would cover the objection raised by the Senator from Georgia to the section, but I am free to state that I do not agree with the construction which the Senator from Georgia places on that section. I believe the construction given by the Attorney-General is substantially correct, because I think, taking the section as a whole, it is quite apparent that it was not the purpose of the law to interfere with a company in sending communications directly down its line in regard to the management of the railway or the stagecoach line. Very manifestly, I think, the purpose was to prevent it from carrying mail unless it related to the cargo. Now, matters pertaining to the disposition of the cargo would be sent probably, not by the railway managers or the owners of the steamboats, but by the shipper. It permits that such mail as that may be carried by the railway line or the stagecoach. I think it is quite clear that it was not designed to prevent the railway line, the stagecoach line, or the steamboat line from sending directions as to the conduct or management of its business along with its employees. However, it seems to me there can be no objection to inserting some words there that would make that clear, and I suggest the insertion of the words I have named to make it clear.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have the greatest respect and confidence in the good judgment of my friend from Oregon, and I should like to resume my law studies a little with him to see if he can tell me how he can construe the language I am about to read to mean that the railroad company could carry any message or any writing—for instance, a letter—which related to anything else than to those things which are specified in this proposed statute, and those words are these:

Which shall carry, otherwise than in the mail, any letters or packets—

Now comes the exception—

except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel, or to some article carried at the same time by the same stagecoach, railway car, or other vehicle.

How those words can be construed to include the right to send any letter except a letter which relates to some part of the cargo on that particular train or to some article carried at the same time I am unable to see. That is the explicit language. There is the restriction in as plain words as language can make it.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I, of course, will not undertake to so explain my views as to convince the Senator from Georgia. He has his views, and I do not undertake to say that he may not be correct; but my contention is—and to me it is reasonably clear—that the purpose of this section was to prevent them carrying mail matter. In order to ascertain the meaning and purpose of a law, you have to take into consideration the subject with which it is dealing. In this instance it is dealing with mailable matter, and it says:

And which shall carry, otherwise than in the mail, any letters or packages, except such as relate to some part of the cargo.

Mr. BACON. Read that part of it to which you are coming. Read the exception carefully.

Mr. FULTON. I will read it again:

And which shall carry, otherwise than in the mail, any letters or packets, except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel.

Manifestly, "such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel" refers to matter that would be sent by the shipper. The steamboat company would not be sending that sort of matter. Manifestly, it would be sent by other parties, and therefore reference is had merely to matter sent by other parties.

I do not think that a direction sent by a railroad company to an employee several stations beyond as to the conduct of its business or what should be done when a train reached there would be considered a letter within the meaning of the postal laws, because that is a mere message or order sent to its employee. It may be sent in writing or not. Within the contemplation of the subject in mind it is not a letter; but taking a letter from some other person or taking a message or direction from some other parties and carrying it would be practically carrying the mail. When the section makes an exception to some direction in regard to the cargo, I say that manifestly has reference to some direction sent by the shipper. I do not think it was ever intended to preclude a railroad line or a steamboat line from sending directions to its employees along down the line for the management and conduct of its own particular business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if an amendment is in order, I move to amend this section. I have not before me the same copy of the bill which the Secretary has, but after the word "vessel," in the eighth line of the print I have of the section, I move to insert the words "or to the current business of the carrier;" so that it will read:

Except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel, or to the current business of the carrier, or to some article carried at the same time by the same stagecoach, railway car, or other vehicle, etc.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that that covers the complaint that we have been making, and I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BACON. I am content with that. I suggested that amendment to the Senator from Utah yesterday, but it was not accepted at that time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just one word. I move that amendment because I think that it puts in express language precisely what the section means as it stands without it. I entirely agree with what the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] has said with reference to that. I think the opinion of the Attorney-General, to which I called attention yesterday, gives the correct construction to this section. The section is dealing with the carrying of mail for others. It is not dealing with the question of the carrying of the mail of the carrier itself. The language to which the Senator referred, namely, "except such as relate to some part of the cargo of such steamboat or other vessel, or to some article carried at the same time," can very well have reference to mail matter intended for others, but having reference to the cargo or having reference to some other article carried by the same carrier——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks there is any danger that those words would be construed as extending beyond the business and management and conduct of the steamboat or railway line? It is proposed to add "or to the current business of the carrier." I do not know but that would restrict a letter being carried pertaining to some other business than the management of or the conduct of the line.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think the amendment would be susceptible of that construction. It certainly is not my intention that it should be. I think it should be clear under the law that the carrier should not have the right to carry mail intended for others, but only its own mail. To that extent I think the law should permit the carrier to go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, in line 14, after the word "vessel," it is proposed to insert the words "or to the current business of the carrier."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next section passed over.

The Secretary read the next section passed over, as follows:

SEC. 204. All letters or other mailable matter conveyed to or from any part of the United States by any foreign vessel, except such sealed letters relating to such vessel or any part of the cargo thereof as may be directed to the owners or consignees of the vessel, shall be subject to postage charge, whether addressed to any person in the United States or elsewhere, provided they are conveyed by the packet or other ship of a foreign country imposing postage on letters or other mailable matter conveyed to or from such country by any vessel of the United States; and such letters or other mailable matter carried in foreign vessels, except such sealed letters relating to the vessel or any part of the cargo thereof as may be directed to the owners or consignees, shall be delivered into the United States post-office by the master or other person having charge or control of such vessel when arriving and be taken from the United States post-office when departing and the postage justly chargeable by law paid thereon; and for refusing or failing to do so, or for conveying such letters or other mailable matter, or any letters or other mailable matter, intended to be conveyed in any vessel of such foreign country over or across the United States or any portion thereof, the party offending shall be fined not more than $1,000.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not recall by whose suggestion that section was passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not at any time known why this section was passed over. It contains no new legislation. It is made up of other statutes. The only change from existing law is its being adapted to conditions that have arisen since the original law was enacted, which is obvious on its face. The words in italics—"or other person having charge or control"—indicate the change. It is intended to avoid technicalities that have been raised by certain persons who are really chargeable with the offense committed and who have escaped because they were not within an enumerated class. The reason for making it sufficiently broad to include all persons who are responsible is obvious.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to the Senator that I am raising no objection to the section. My impression is, though, that the section was passed over at the suggestion of some member of the Post-Office Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest for the information of the Senator from Georgia that it was not passed over at the request of any Senator. It does not appear by the notes of the Secretary as having been passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on the margin of the copy of the bill which I use I have noted that the section was passed over at the request of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. That is the marginal note.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I may be mistaken.

Mr. BACON. It may have been passed over at the request of my colleague [Mr. CLAY], who is on the Post-Office Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary has no record of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then let it be adopted without further consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask that we return to section 115, as I presume it is desired to take up the deferred sections as rapidly as they can be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Idaho asks that section 115 may be now considered. The section will be read.

The Secretary read the section, as follows:

SEC. 115. [Whoever, being elected a Senator, Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner from any Territory of the United States, shall, after his election and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, or being the head of a department, or other officer or clerk in the employ of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatever for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, before any department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than two years; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.]

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the amendment which I submitted to that section yesterday and to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdraws the amendment to the section which is before the Senate, and proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "any," in line 24, on page 57, it is proposed to insert the words "court in any civil cause;" so as to read:

SEC. 115. [Whoever, being elected a Senator, Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner from any Territory of the United States, shall, after his election and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, or being the head of a department, or other officer or clerk in the employ of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatever for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, before any court in any civil cause, department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, there is objection.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know what section it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Section 115, line 24, page 57.

Mr. TELLER. There is no such line in the copy of the bill I have before me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado does not have before him the text of the bill which is before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. This is the last print.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The last print is not before the Senate. The text which is before the Senate is the bill proper.

Mr. TELLER. We want a vote on the amendment. It can not pass nem. con.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is after the word "any," in line 9 of the reprint, I will say to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. HEYBURN. I assumed that the Senator from Idaho was going to make some remarks in regard to the amendment. I certainly do not intend that it shall be adopted without some discussion.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to discuss the proposition. I simply wish to submit it to a vote of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the question involved in this amendment was discussed yesterday. It is the same question; only it is presented in a different form. I should like very much to make some progress with the bill. We have spent some hours over the question whether railroad companies should carry communications between employees with or without postage, and have not made very much progress. We discussed this question pretty well yesterday. I do not know that any Senator has anything further to say, nor do I know that he has not, and I think probably the amendment had better go over for the day and see if we can make some progress with the bill. There are not enough Senators in the Chamber to attempt to vote upon it, and it might defeat the purpose of the consideration of the bill to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the section will be passed over.

Mr. BURKETT. I was watching section 185, and just as the Clerk got to it some one called me to the rear of the Chamber, and it was acted upon. I did not notice it. I should like to have the amendment put in section 185 read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, line 14, section 185, after the words "other vessel," insert "or to the current business of the carrier."

Mr. TELLER. I think we ought to be furnished with the print that the Clerk reads from.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are plenty of them.

Mr. TELLER. I have a print here, the last one made, I understand. I can not follow it either by the sections or the pages. I want to know exactly what the Clerk is reading from.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary is reading from the text of the bill. Evidently the Senator from Colorado has a different print.

Mr. TELLER. There are three or four prints here.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is confusing the report of the committee with the bill. There is only one print of the bill. The report of the committee as originally printed has been reprinted, omitting the sections disposed of, but the bill has been printed but once.

Mr. TELLER. Then we ought to have it according to the report of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is being read from the bill. The report of the committee is merely for the convenience of Senators.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Clerk tell us where we are? I think I have the proper print now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment which was reported by the Secretary at the request of the Senator from Nebraska is in line 14, page 96, of the bill.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not have a copy of the bill, but I think it is in line 12 of the print which the Senator from Colorado has.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that if Senators follow the reprint of sections passed over, the lines and pages do not correspond with the text of the bill, and there will be a great deal of confusion. The Secretary has before him only the text of the bill reported by the committee and not the reprint of the sections taken out, passed over, and reprinted.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to Senators that a page can furnish them with a copy of the bill in a moment. There are a number of them here.

Mr. TELLER. I have a copy of the bill. I want to find out what the amendment is.

Mr. FULTON. The Clerk read the amendment a moment ago in these words, "or to the current business of the carrier." I did not understand the Senator from Utah in offering the amendment to suggest the word "or." I think it simply is after the comma to insert the words "to the current business of the carrier."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is correct.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I understand an amendment has been made to this section. I was sitting here watching it and was called to the rear of the Chamber at the moment when it was acted upon. It seems to me in that amendment we have opened up a pretty big proposition, and I should like to have it go over. If it is agreeable to the Senator in charge of the bill to have it go over until the next time we take up the bill, I should be glad to have that done. Or else I want an opportunity when the bill comes into the Senate to interpose some objections to the amendment, if the conditions are as I think they are. I do not wish to make a motion to reconsider if the Senator would rather handle it by unanimous consent in some other way.

I fear we open up there a competition for a good deal of business, for, as I understand the amendment, it opens up all the business of a railroad company without any let or hindrance. I think that is more than a railroad company or anybody else ever contended for. I should like to interpose at some time an objection to it, and I should like to have a little opportunity to look it up and see just what the conditions are now. If the Senator wants to pass it over, very well. If he does not, I will move to reconsider.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall in a moment ask that it be passed over. It has been adopted. Of course, it is open to recurrence. But it is most unfortunate that the consideration of a section of the existing law, as that section is, which has been in operation for twenty-seven years, or thereabouts, which has been construed by the administrative department of the Government, should take up almost one entire day, to the end that the railroad company is exempted from paying duty on its letters as others are required to pay. I think we have probably spent enough time over that section now to justify us in laying it aside, hoping that a little quiet, careful study within the seclusion of their chambers will enable Senators to see that this amendment will simply extend what is already construed to be practically a frank to the railroad companies to the extent of thousands and thousands of dollars, which privilege they ought never to have had.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. It is not a frank, because the company does not put the communications in the mail.

Mr. HEYBURN. It carries them in the cars.

Mr. TELLER. They are not carried in the mail. They are carried by their employees from one point to another, just exactly as the merchant who has three stories sends from one story to another his orders in writing by his employees.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the matter will go over for the day. I think I see the scope of it.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say, since the Senator from Idaho has so much feeling in the matter, that if this section has been construed satisfactorily to him for so long, I do not see any necessity for having any amendment made to the law. The very fact that this is chucked in here indicates that there is some method behind it, and anybody with as much observation as a member of the Senate ought to have has observed in times past that there is a reason why these particular words are proposed.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I propose to find out what the ruling of the Department is, and I propose to find out what it includes. I know, as every Senator does, that the railroad companies are to-day paying postage on a vast amount of their business. If this amendment is put in, it will not only include traffic mail—messages with reference to their traffic—but it will include all of their mail between one law officer of a railroad company and another, a privilege for which they have never contended, as I understand.

I think the law was made for two purposes. In the first place, the Government did not want any competitors. It did not want any concern—a stage coach or a mail carrier or a railroad company—competing with it in the same kind of business. The fact that a railroad company or a stage-coach line or a letter carrier makes a contract to carry the mail constitutes no reason why it should have its mail transported free, any more than anybody else who has a contract with the Government should have a similar privilege. Of course I know Senators may say that the roads themselves do the hauling, and the Government does not. That is true, and yet there are equities that the Government has in this fact: By the contract it makes the equipment is furnished, and there is the special car that is supplied, and, certainly, those facilities are brought about by the contract that the Government makes. There are limits beyond which, it seems to me, the railroad ought not to go or expect to go, and, as I understand, does not go now, with the use of these trains without paying postage rates.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Nebraska seems to be under the impression that I have favored this amendment. I have been speaking against it and opposing it. The decision which he expresses a desire to hear read has been read and reread and discussed in this Chamber by several Senators during the consideration of this section. I have opposed the amendment for the reasons stated by the Senator, and it is not now in the bill because of any acquiescence on my part that the section should go in.

Mr. TELLER. The suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska that there is something back of this section comes at a very bad time and with little grace when the Senator who made the fight on this is out of the Chamber. If the construction that has been put upon the law is correct, the law is not changed in the slightest degree by the amendment. This has been the custom of railroad companies for many years to my certain knowledge. The Attorney-General has said that that was the meaning of the law, as read here the other day. Perhaps there is not any necessity for an amendment of this provision, and I am certain that no railroad company has given it the slightest attention or cares a continental one way or the other whether it is amended or not. They are doing this, and they have been doing it to my certain knowledge for fifty years. I had in my younger days some connection with those matters. I know that current business is sent not by mail, but by the hands of a messenger. That is always the case and always will be the case, I have no doubt. The Senator who has been discussing this, more particularly upon a point of law, is now present, and therefore I shall say nothing more about it.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska, in employing the language he did, unintentionally did an injustice to those who have consented to this amendment and to the Senator who offered the amendment, the Senator from Utah. I do not think the Senator from Nebraska intended to do so, but he spoke of this amendment as having been chucked in here for some purpose, and, from the language he used, the inference was, for some ulterior, hidden, or secret purpose. I think it is due to the Senator from Utah to say that the way the discussion arose was on a suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, that if a relief train were to be sent down the line—I think that is what the Senator suggested—the railroad company could not, under this law, literally construed, send along a letter of instructions as to the conduct of the train. Others thought differently. But because some were so strongly of the opinion that the correct construction of the section would lead to such a result, the Senator from Utah offered the amendment, which was accepted, and which does nothing more than simply make the section plainly express what the Attorney-General has held it meant and has been the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I was not in the Chamber, having for the moment been called out, and I do not know what the particular language was, except what I have heard quoted by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Oregon, and I want to say that so far as I am concerned I am not at all disturbed by it. I do not think anybody will consider that I had any ulterior motive in the matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not quite understand what the Senator from Nebraska meant by intimating that there was some purpose behind an amendment of this character other than appeared upon the face of it. If he had been in the Chamber listening to the debate, which has occupied perhaps two hours of the time of the Senate, he would have heard that I have contended all the way through that the amendment was not necessary at all. So far as I am concerned, I do not care two straws whether it goes into the bill or out of it. I think the law means the same whether the amendment is in it or not.

I called attention to a decision of the Attorney-General to the effect that that was the meaning of the law and contended that an amendment was not necessary. Other Senators in the Chamber seemed to think it was necessary. An intermediate discussion seemed to be in progress, and in order to put an end to it and to make the law read as I think it means, I offered the amendment. I had no other purpose at all in offering it.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, it seems that almost everyone who has arisen to speak on this amendment does not believe in the amendment, and yet Senators seem to take some offense at something I may have said. I do not know and I can not recall (and I have to no purpose inquired of those sitting about me) that I have said anything reflecting or which in any possible way could be construed to reflect upon anybody's motives. I certainly had no intention of reflecting upon the motives of anyone here. But the very fact that this is in the section indicates that in somebody's mind there is a need of some sort for it. That is what I intended to say, and I think those are about the words I used.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he was present yesterday and listened to the debate or has read in the RECORD the debate of yesterday?

Mr. BURKETT. I was present and heard almost all of it, I will say to the Senator from California.

Mr. FLINT. Then I do not understand how the Senator could have the idea he has that it was chucked into this bill.

Mr. BURKETT. It seems to be in there. I do not know whether it was chucked in or how it got in. It is in just the same.

As I was saying when the Senator rose, if I have said anything that in any way reflects upon the motive of any Senator upon the floor, I certainly withdraw it, because I am not one of those who reflect on people's motives. When you put in that clause there, which reads "to the current business of the carrier," you throw the thing wide open, and the Post-Office never has thrown the thing wide open, and the railroads themselves have never thrown it wide open in their construction of it. If you put that amendment in there, in my opinion, a railroad official can write a letter to anybody on the current business of the railroad and transport it free. I do not believe it is the intention of Congress, I do not believe it is the intention of the Senator who introduced the amendment, that it should be carried to that extreme. I suspect it was his idea largely, as the law has been construed by the Department and as the railroads have done, that messages and letters that pertain to the immediate traffic management of the railroad should be sent along the line by the messengers who go along. But I do not believe it was ever intended by the Senator who introduced the amendment that all the correspondence which a railroad official or employee anywhere has with another official or employee or with an outside party should be carried free. It simply means that so far as the railroads are concerned—and they do a vast mail business—they can build up a mail service entirely outside the Government postal service. I do not believe that was the intention of the Senator who introduced the amendment, and it certainly has never been the intention or the construction of the Department, and it never has been the intention and construction of the railroad companies themselves.

I listened to the debate. I kept out of it. I did not expect the amendment would go through, I will say. Just as it was voted on I was sitting on one of the settees in the rear of the Chamber, and that is why I brought up the matter later on. I have no objection to making the section conform to the rulings of the Department, but it seems to me the rulings of the Department are broad enough. If it is construed that broadly, I can not see why we should put some new words in the section that will call for a new interpretation and undoubtedly be a broader interpretation than has ever been put on the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next passed over section.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 207. Whoever, being a postmaster or other person employed in any branch of the postal service, shall make, or assist in making, or cause to be made, a false return, statement, or account to any officer of the United States, or shall make, assist in making, or cause to be made, a false entry in any record, book, or account, required by law or the rules or regulations of the Post-Office Department to be kept in respect of the business or operations of any post-office, or other branch of the postal service, for the purpose of fraudulently increasing his compensation or the compensation of the postmaster or any employee in a post-office; or whoever, being a postmaster or other person employed in any post-office or station thereof, shall induce, or attempt to induce, for the purpose of increasing the emoluments or compensation of his office, any person to deposit mail matter in, or forward in any manner for mailing at, the office where such postmaster or other person is employed, knowing such matter to be properly mailable at another post-office, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 218. [All kinds of poison, and all articles and compositions containing poison, and all poisonous animals, insects, and reptiles, and explosives of all kinds, and inflammable materials, and infernal machines, and mechanical, chemical, or other devices or compositions which may ignite or explode, and all disease germs or scabs, and all other natural or artificial articles, compositions, or materials of whatever kind which may kill, or in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another, or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, whether sealed as first-class matter or not, are hereby declared to be nonmailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post-office or station thereof, nor by any letter carrier; but the Postmaster-General shall permit the transmission in the mails, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe as to preparation and packing, of any articles hereinbefore described which are not outwardly or of their own force dangerous or injurious to life, health, or property. Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or deliver, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail according to the direction thereon, or at any place at which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, unless in accordance with the rules and regulations hereby authorized to be prescribed by the Postmaster-General, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail according to the direction thereon, or at any place to which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, whether transmitted in accordance with the rules and regulations authorized to be prescribed by the Postmaster-General or not, with the design, intent, or purpose to kill, or in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another, or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.]

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, this is a section which I do not believe should be adopted. I do not think the change ought to be made. Let us take the law as it now stands:

Mailable matter of the third class shall embrace all pamphlets, occasional publications, transient newspapers, magazines, handbills, posters, unsealed circulars, prospectuses, books, book manuscripts, proof sheets, corrected proof sheets, maps, prints, engravings, blanks, flexible patterns, samples of merchandise not exceeding 12 ounces in weight, sample cards, phonographic paper, letter envelopes, postal envelopes and wrappers, cards, plain and ornamental paper, photographic representations of different types, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and all other matter which may be declared mailable by law, and all other articles not above the weight prescribed by law, which are not, from their form or nature, liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise injure the contents of the mail bag or the person of any one engaged in the postal service. All liquids—

This is the provision I desire to call attention to—

All liquids, poisons, glass, explosive materials, and obscene books shall be excluded from the mails.

Mr. President, under the provision of existing law the Postmaster-General has held that liquors could not be placed in boxes and sent by mail. That has been a regulation of the Department in carrying out this provision of the law for a number of years.

The Postmaster-General will be required, as it is proposed to change the law, to carry through the mails beer, whisky, liquids of any kind from one State to another. Take my State. The legislature of my State has enacted a prohibition law. Take Tennessee, and then you can take other States which have not adopted prohibition laws. The whisky houses in those States can pack their whisky in boxes and send it through the mails, as you propose to change the law. If you leave the law as it was, that can not be done. It would be a violation of the law. I believe we ought to assist the States in carrying out their laws. I believe that instead of making it compulsory upon the Postmaster-General to deliver mail matter of that kind, we ought to make a penal law and enforce it, so as not to allow liquors to be shipped from a wet to a dry State. I can not imagine why this change was made.

I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether the change was made by the committee or by the revisers?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The act of March 3, 1879, divided mailable matter into four classes. This was accomplished by dividing third-class matter into two classes, the third and fourth, and fourth-class matter was therein defined to be, just as provided in the section, "all matter not embraced in the first, second, or third class, which is not in its form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail bag or harm the person of anyone engaged in the postal service."

This act has been amended from time to time so as to exclude certain enumerated articles. In the judgment of the committee the prohibition contained in existing law is just as strongly contained in this proposed form of legislation.

Personally, I am in entire sympathy with the purpose which the Senator has in view of excluding liquor from the mails, and if the section as reported does not accomplish that purpose, I will accede to any amendment which will leave no doubt about it.

Mr. CLAY. It certainly does not accomplish it, I will say to the Senator, because the old law expressly provides that liquids or liquors shall not be considered mailable matter. You could not, to save your life, under existing law, without violating it, pack a bottle of liquor and ship it through the mails. But surely if this change is made there is no question but that you can do it.

I do not believe the Senator answered my question. I asked him whether this change had been made by the committee or whether the revisors appointed by Congress to revise these statutes made it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will have to look that up.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I do not charge any member of the committee with any such knowledge—I am incapable of doing it—but it has been charged that the liquor interest of this country is back of this legislation. It is a fact which I know to be true that wholesale liquor houses outside of my State and adjoining my State are lined up on this change in order to enhance their business.

I maintain the proposition that when a State by a majority of its people adopts prohibition it is the duty of Congress to come to its assistance and to prevent in every way possible the shipment of whisky from a wet to a dry State. But when you allow the mails to be used for any such purpose, it can not be detected, and in every mail you will find bottles of liquor being shipped by wholesale houses from wet to dry States, and prohibition will be an absolute failure under such conditions in any of our States.

I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that the committee will not insist upon this change.

The old law provides, as I have just read, that all liquids of every nature and kind, poisons, and glass, and explosive materials, and obscene books, shall be excluded from the mails. There is nothing in this new provision that excludes liquids of any class or kind.

I know that the Post-Office has opposed this legislation. The Post-Office Department, to its honor and to its credit, has enforced the existing laws for a number of years; and now because the Post-Office Department has enforced the existing laws we are here saying to the Department, "We will leave you no discretion; you shall mail it from one State to another."

Mr. HEYBURN. I am now prepared to answer the question which the Senator asked.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to suggest that if the Senator from Idaho or the committee intends to insist on this change in the section, I desire to offer an amendment in line 6, after the word "explode," as follows:

And all liquids and glass and all obscene books.

That will virtually restore the old section. I agree with the Senator from Georgia that if this section is not amended people living outside the prohibition States will use the mails to transport liquor from wet States into dry States. I insist upon an amendment that will shut the liquors out of the mails.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I suggest, if I can get the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill, that an amendment such as this will obviate all the trouble apprehended by the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Kansas. After the word "poison," in the first line, insert the words "and spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors;" and then after the word "property," in line 12, on page 116, insert the words "except spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors." That will accomplish everything that is desired by the Senator from Georgia and by the Senator from Kansas, and will do no harm to this section.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will first report the amendments proposed. Did the Senator from Kansas propose an amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. I proposed an amendment in line 6 of the reprint.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will first report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas. The Chair would suggest that the Senator state his amendment to the text of the bill.

The SECRETARY. On page 115, line 25, after the words "or explode," insert the words "and all liquids and glass and all obscene books."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas, but I think that the latter part of his amendment, with reference to obscene literature, is covered by other provisions of law, and therefore it would not be necessary here.

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing to leave that part out. I did not notice that it had been covered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is covered, as I recall, fully.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I ask to leave out the words "obscene books."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas modifies his amendment, as follows:

The SECRETARY. After the word "explode," in line 25, page 115, insert the words "and all liquids and glass."

Mr. CLAY. I would be glad to have that part of the section read as it is proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

And infernal machines, and mechanical, chemical, or other devices or compositions which may ignite or explode, and all liquids and glass, and all disease germs or scabs," etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the scope of the words "and glass." Glass is a term that would apply to any kind of glass fixtures or ornaments, and they are continually going through the mails. If it means liquids in glass that might be different, but you do not want to exclude everything made of glass from the mails of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. Glass as used in the existing law.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we on this side of the Chamber would like to have the benefit of the discussion, but we are not getting it. It is an important question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. TELLER. The trouble is that the Senator from Idaho faces the other way and does not speak very loud, and we do not hear a word he says. He has a good voice, and I wish he would raise it a little so that we may hear him.

Mr. HEYBURN. My suggestion directed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas was that to use the term "and glass" after enumerating certain articles would perhaps be far beyond the scope of his intention in proposing the amendment, because when you are enumerating articles to be excluded from the mails and among them enumerate "glass" after the word "and" it would have a very far-reaching effect, and exclude everything that was made of glass.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is precisely the present law.

Mr. HEYBURN. It may be the present law and it may not be well drawn.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has worked pretty well.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the Senator is seeking to exclude by this provision the transmission of liquids or liquor by mail.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; I am speaking in the time of the Senator from Kansas and by his permission.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to say that all I desire by the amendment is to exclude intoxicating liquors from the mails, and used the word "glass" in the amendment offered because the word "glass" appears in the original section.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him in what line he proposes to have the amendment inserted?

Mr. CURTIS. In line 6, after the word "explode."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment is on line 25, page 115, of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. It ought to come in on line 6, after the word "explode."

Mr. CURTIS. That is where I have offered it, but in the other print it is line 25.

Mr. CLAY. I suggest to the Senator to let it come after the word "poison," in line 1, the first line of the section. That probably would be better. It would then read "all kinds of poison and liquids."

Mr. HEYBURN. "Intoxicating liquids."

Mr. CLAY. I would not say intoxicating liquids, because now under the rule you can not even send medicines that are liquid by mail.

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall say, intoxicating liquors, and that it be added after the word "poison," or any place else, so that it is put in this section.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I think it is clearly improper to permit liquids to enjoy the privileges of the mail——

Mr. CLAY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. Regardless of the question whether they are intoxicating or not. The section provides that no matter shall be mailable which in its nature may be injurious to or calculated to damage other matter in the mail. It is known that the mail is carried in sacks, and that the sacks now provided are much lighter than formerly, inasmuch as we are now using canvas sacks almost exclusively, whereas heavy leather sacks were formerly used.

It is well known, likewise, that these sacks are thrown from passing trains to the platform and that they are loaded upon sleighs, dog sleds, stagecoaches, and carried on horseback in all parts of the country, and that they must be filled with a character of material which will admit of pretty rough treatment at times. The permission to send a bottle of water in the mails imperils every particle of mail in the sack in which that bottle of water is carried. I think the existing law, which prohibits the transmission of liquids in the mails, but shows a proper regard for the preservation and safety of the mail.

I certainly hope the Senator from Kansas will not accept the amendment "intoxicating" preceding the words "liquids" or "liquor."

Mr. HEYBURN and Mr. TELLER addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly; I yield to both Senators.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the chairman of the committee tell us what the objection is to section 3878, the existing law, and why there was any necessity for a change, and a very material change, too.

Mr. HEYBURN. In my personal judgment there was no necessity whatever for changing existing law, and, if I may be permitted to intrude upon the time of the Senator from Georgia to that extent, I will state the conditions under which this legislation is proposed.

The commission appointed many years ago to revise and codify the laws reported section 8852, which is in the possession of every Senator in the volumes such as I have before me, because I saw them on all the desks at the opening of the Congress. They reported the section substantially as the committee have adopted it in this bill. They were of the opinion that under the rules which have been long in force in the Department the words excluding anything from the mails which would—in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another, or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, whether sealed as first-class matter or not, are hereby declared to be nonmailable matter—would exclude anything that was liable to break, spill, and injure or damage the contents of a mail bag.

I personally do not think that it was necessary to adopt language that might by a strained construction be held to be sufficient when it was so easy to leave the law as it has existed for some years and which named the articles specifically.

I am not personally advised as to the fact, but I have been formally advised that these sections pertaining to the Post-Office Department and certain other Departments were submitted by the Commission to the officials of the Department as to whether or not they were sufficiently comprehensive to meet the necessities of the occasion. That was done long before I had anything to do with the consideration of this question; I am advised that it was the habit of the Commission to do so. The Commission was composed not of Members of Congress alone, but of laymen—at least a portion of it—appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and they did this work some years ago. I know of no objection whatever to inserting the specific words that would preclude this class of articles from the mail which ought never to have been the subject of transmission in the United States mail.

In answer to the inquiry made by the Senator from Georgia before I had procured a copy of the Commission's report, I say to him that the committee of the two Houses of Congress, one of which has reported this bill to the Senate, simply took their work in regard to this section from the work of the Commission. They were not a unit as to the wisdom of making a change in the existing law. I am quite sure that no member of the committee will strenuously oppose the adoption of the existing law in lieu of this section.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator in all candor that that ought to conclude this matter. If the committee is willing to restore the old law, it certainly would be agreeable, I believe, to the Senate to restore it. I do not know the minds of the Senate, but I have yet heard no objection to the restoration of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like the Senator to understand I do not say the members of the committee would be willing to restore the existing law, because the best evidence that they were not in favor of reporting the existing law is the fact that they did not do it; but I am speaking only for myself as a member of the committee.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. The suggestion that the law be left as it now exists I think is a very apt suggestion. In the first place, I think it is a bad practice to indulge in amendments of an existing law under which constructions are well understood and extensively made, unless such amendment is called for by some apparent necessity.

The particular section proposed as a substitute for section 3878 of the Revised Statutes is not open only to the objections heretofore made, but I think a very potent and substantial objection is found in the lodgment by the new section of a most dangerous discretion in the Postmaster-General to include or exclude any of these prohibited articles whenever he may think necessary or proper.

Mr. President, this is and ought to be, to the most liberal extent, a government by and under fixed laws. There is no part of the Federal Government more productive of complaint or injustice than that which is administered under rules and regulations created and administered by executive officers. We know something of that in connection with other phases of the law. Where the citizen can have his rights clearly specified by the law, he may protect them, and he may with safety take a rational construction of the law as he finds it. But where rules and regulations are being made, modified, and rescinded from time to time, the citizen is at no time very clearly apprised of the exact state of the law on any particular subject.

This section or proposed amendment first proceeds to state the character of articles and in some cases to specify the articles which may not be carried in the United States mails. After the specification it will be observed that, in line 13, page 30, these words appear:

But the Postmaster-General shall permit the transmission in the mails, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe as to preparation and packing, of any articles hereinbefore described which are not outwardly or of their own force dangerous or injurious to life, health, or property.

Mr. CLAY. Right there, with the Senator's permission——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly. I am speaking in the Senator's time.

Mr. CLAY. That is all right. I do not understand from that qualification that the Postmaster-General would have any discretion in preventing the transmission of liquids. In other words, he has a discretion as to the preparation and packing of certain articles mentioned, but this section intends that there shall be conveyed through the mails all things not prohibited in the section, and consequently I believe that under the new section, if it was adopted, the Postmaster-General could not use any discretion to prevent the transportation of liquids through the mails. But I agree with the Senator, that we ourselves ought to say, by express law, what shall be transmitted through the mails and not leave it to the regulations of a Department. We leave too many things to the regulations of the Departments.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this language lodges not only discretion, but apparently fixes a mandatory duty upon the Postmaster-General to nullify the law by admitting articles into the mails if they are so packed as not to furnish outwardly or of their own force dangerous or injurious elements to life or property.

The Senator from Georgia, the Senator from Kansas, and other Senators here are very anxious that the laws of their States prohibiting the importation and use of liquor or the sale of liquor in the State should not be nullified by a section in the postal laws of the country. If we insert the word "liquid" in this section, as proposed in the amendment, and leave the qualification which compels the Postmaster-General to permit the liquid to go through if properly packed, you may just as well not have any legislation at all on the subject.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. I will ask the Senator from Montana what is the objection now to substituting the original section for this proposed amendment, and let it go at that—that is, the law as it exists to-day?

Mr. CARTER. I am not aware of any objection to the existing law, and I am perplexed to know why the proposition occurred to the Commission, to which the Senator from Idaho has referred, to substitute this section for one well understood, long in operation, and generally satisfactory, I believe.

Mr. PILES. Then, I suggest to the Senator from Montana, that he propose, as a substitute for the pending section, the existing law.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate disagree to the proposed amendment known as "section 218."

Mr. CLAY. I had the floor, but I am always willing to give up the floor at any time. The only object and purpose I had in speaking was to restore the old law, and I do not want to speak a minute——

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw my motion, Mr. President.

Mr. CLAY. I do not want to talk at any time unless I can accomplish something; but I desire to ask, is it not true that this new section is offered as a substitute for the old law? Is not that what the Commission did? If we vote down the new section as reported by the committee, does not that restore the old law?

Mr. CARTER. The committee propose to amend the existing law. If that amendment fails, the law remains in operation.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I will say that I agree with the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. I belive if you restore the first part of this law, which provides that liquids shall not be mailable matter, and leave the other provision as to packing, etc., to the Postmaster-General, then the Postmaster-General can exercise his discretion in such a way that liquors may continue to be shipped from a wet State to a dry State.

Mr. TELLER. We should substitute the old law for this.

Mr. CLAY. I am willing to vote on the proposition now, Mr. President.

Mr. CARTER. I will then change the form of my amendment, and move to strike out section 218 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof section 3878 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, the provisions of the section.

Mr. CARTER. The provisions of section 3878 of the Revised Statutes, together with the sections following on page 31 of the print I hold in my hand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The SECRETARY. On page 115 of the bill it is proposed to strike out all of section 218 and to substitute in lieu thereof section 3878 of the existing law.

Mr. CARTER. Together with the remaining matter found on page 31, which I presume is necessary in order to complete the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, to be section 218, as follows:

SEC. 218. Mailable matter of the third class shall embrace all pamphlets, occasional publications, transient newspapers, magazines, hand bills, posters, unsealed circulars, prospectuses, books, book manuscripts, proof sheets, corrected proof sheets, maps, prints, engravings, blanks, flexible patterns, samples of merchandise not exceeding 12 ounces in weight, sample cards, phonographic paper, letter envelopes, postal envelopes and wrappers, cards, plain and ornamental paper, photographic representations of different types, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and all other matter which may be declared mailable by law, and all other articles not above the weight prescribed by law, which are not, from their form or nature, liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise injure the contents of the mail bag or the person of anyone engaged in the postal service. All liquids, poisons, glass, explosive materials, and obscene books shall be excluded from the mails. All matter of the third class, excepting books and other printed matter, book manuscripts, proof sheets, and corrected proof sheets, packages of seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, and scions, shall not exceed 12 ounces in weight, and packages of seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, and scions shall not exceed 4 pounds in weight; and all matter of the third class shall be subject to examination and to rates of postage as hereinafter provided. Samples of metals, ores, and mineralogical specimens shall not exceed 12 ounces in weight, and shall be subject to examination and to rates of postage as hereinafter provided. Mailable matter of the fourth class shall embrace all matter not embraced in the first, second, or third class, which is not in its form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail bag, or harm the person of anyone engaged in the postal service, and is not above the weight provided by law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to the fact that section 3878 and section 20 of the supplement are not penal provisions at all, while section 218 is a penal section. I have no objection whatever to the purpose which the Senator from Montana has in view, but if those sections are to be substituted then there should be some penal provision added. The Senator will observe that, beginning in line 25 of the committee report, on page 242, the section proceeds:

Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail according to the direction thereon, * * * shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

So that if we are to have a penalty attached to the violation of this provision of existing law, we shall have to write it in in addition to what the Senator proposed to substitute.

Mr. CARTER. I will offer an amendment, Mr. President, in the course of a few moments.

Mr. TELLER. Is there any penalty attached in the general law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the penalty is new. There is no penalty in the existing law.

Mr. CLAY. Is there not a general penalty provided by the postal laws?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know.

Mr. CLAY. Since I have been in the Senate I have known of one case to arise where a package had been sent through the mails, and I have it in mind now, where a constituent of mine was fined $25 by the Post-Office Department, and he appealed to me to try to get the amount of the fine refunded to him. While I am not sure of it, I think there is a general statute imposing a maximum and a minimum penalty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is not my recollection, Mr. President. My recollection is that wherever a penalty is imposed it is attached to the particular section.

Mr. TELLER. No; I think the Senator is mistaken as to that. There is a penalty in the postal laws somewhere, I am confident, although I can not point it out at this moment. At all events, the committee can find whether that is a fact and report accordingly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Even if that be so, Mr. President, the purpose of this revision is to bring into this code, in a comprehensive way, all of the penal provisions in the law, and it seems to me that the most scientific way of proceeding is to attach a specific penalty to each section of the penal code.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator that if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Montana—and I hope we shall—that we can adopt the penalty provided in the existing law.

Mr. CARTER. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, which I think will perfect the section.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To that I have no objection, and I have no objection to the purpose which the Senator has in view.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana modifies his amendment by the addition of the language which will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment it is proposed to add the following words:

Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail according to the direction thereon, or at any place at which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail according to the direction thereon, or at any place to which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, with the design, intent, or purpose to kill, or in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another, or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], which has just been read.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is the existing law with the penalty attached which is proposed by the pending bill.

Mr. CLAY. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next section which was passed over will be read.

The Secretary read section 225, on page 121, as follows:

SEC. 225. Whoever shall make, allege, or present, or cause to be made, alleged, or presented, or assist, aid, or abet in making, alleging, or presenting any claim or application for indemnity for the loss of any registered letter, parcel, package, or other article or matter, or the contents thereof, knowing such claim or application to be false, fictitious, or fraudulent; or whoever for the purpose of obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment or approval of any such claim or application, shall make or use, or cause to be made or used, any false statement, certificate, affidavit, or deposition; or whoever shall knowingly and willfully misrepresent, misstate, or conceal any material fact or circumstance in respect of any such claim or application for indemnity, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to follow the reading of the sections of this bill and at the same time to examine the corresponding sections of the present law. I should like to have the Senators in charge of the bill indicate what are the proposed changes in the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the section is new, but the principle is not new. It is merely an extension of the principle of the existing law to a new condition of affairs. There has been a change with reference to the subject-matter of this offense. I will just read the notes which I have made in regard to it.

SEC. 225. The act of February 27, 1897 (2 Supp., 564), and of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat. L., 1174), authorize the Postmaster-General to indemnify a person for the loss of a package of registered mail matter in an amount not exceeding its value and in no case to exceed $100. The Postmaster-General has fixed $25 as the maximum amount which will be allowed for the loss of any registered matter.

This section is aimed to punish any person for presenting any false claim for the loss of registered matter, and also to punish any person for making any false claim for any matter received at the division of dead letters. There is no law punishing such acts.

There is no law punishing this class of claims at the division of dead letters.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. I think there are two words in line 15 of this section that ought to go out; that is, the words "or conceal." I think it would be pretty severe penalty to impose upon any person who happened to know any fact in reference to a claim of this kind, who was entirely disconnected from it, and who did not make it known, to be punished by a fine of $500 or a year in the penitentiary. It is all right, I think, to put a pretty heavy penalty upon the man who knowingly and willfully misrepresents or misstates any fact——

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, the word "conceal" there applies to a party making an affidavit or a sworn statement in regard to his rights; in other words, if he were to conceal the fact that he had already been compensated for the loss and I think the Senator will find that the subsequent language qualifies that word. It does not refer to an outside party. It refers to a party making a sworn statement.

Mr. McLAURIN. But this language is broad enough to take in an outside party, and I do not think it ought to go upon the statute book. I do not think there ought to be any such doubt upon the language used as to make it necessary to be construed by the courts. It can be made very clear. I think that the man who makes a misrepresentation or a misstatement is guilty of a very gross offense, but I do not think the man who has nothing to do with it, though he conceals something that he knows, ought to be punished. This language would include a case of that kind, and it might result in a man who did know about it and who did conceal the fact, but who was not interested in it one way or the other, being indicted and put to a great deal of trouble and expense.

The very fact that a man is indicted in court is a great punishment to him. It does not make any difference how perfectly innocent he may be, if he is indicted he has to go to the expense of defending himself before the court. Not only that; but the disgrace that it entails upon the man who is indicted is something that will follow him always afterwards, although he may be entirely innocent. When you indict a man for an offense, though after a while he may be acquitted, it is an easy matter to start on its errand a statement that he has been indicted, and tardy justice and tardy truth may never overtake the charge that has gone abroad that he has been indicted for a felony. Frequently, when a man is acquitted, it is very easy for some person to say that he was acquitted on a technicality. So I think that this language is broad enough, as the Senator must see, to include a person who has no connection with a claim, who does not urge the claim, but who happens to know some facts about it and does not go and make them known. "Conceal"—that is a word that may be construed to include a man who merely keeps silent.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senator will read back to the beginning of the sentence, he will see that it says "whoever for the purpose of obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment, conceals," etc.

Mr. McLAURIN. No, sir; I do not so understand it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the way it is written.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not so read the language. It says:

Or whoever for the purpose of obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment or approval of any such claim or application, shall make or use, or cause to be made or used, any false statement, certificate, affidavit, or deposition—

There is a semicolon—

or whoever shall knowingly and willfully misrepresent, misstate, or conceal any material fact or circumstance in respect of any such claim, etc.

That takes in not only the man who for the purpose of "obtaining or aiding * * * shall make or use, or cause to be made or used, any false statement, certificate," etc., but any man, even though he has no connection with it, who shall conceal, etc. If the construction for which the Senator from Idaho contends is to be given, there is no necessity for the clause following the semicolon on line 13, because all that is said with that view after the word "or" is said before. I do not think those words ought to be here, and I move to strike out the words "or conceal." I shall insist upon that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 121, at the end of line 14, it is proposed to strike out the comma and at the beginning of line 15 the words "or conceal," so as to read:

Or whoever shall knowingly and willfully misrepresent, misstate any material fact or circumstance in respect of any such claim or application for indemnity, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The Secretary read the next section passed over, as follows:

SEC. 234. [Whoever shall knowingly ship, send, or forward any of the articles mentioned in the section last preceding, or shall transport the same by any mode of conveyance upon land or water between any of the places specified in that section, unless such articles be securely inclosed, deposited, or packed in conformity with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it will be observed that section 233, which immediately precedes this section, makes it a penal offense for any person to transport any of the explosive materials which are enumerated on board any vessel or vehicle whatever employed in conveying passengers by land or water, and so on. Section 234 provides:

Whoever shall knowingly ship, send, or forward any of the articles mentioned in this section last preceding, * * * unless such articles be securely inclosed, deposited, or packed in conformity with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor—

Shall be guilty of a penal offense and punishable. It has occurred to me that perhaps the purpose of that law would be made clearer if we added a proviso to it as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the conveyance of any such article upon any vessel or vehicle employed in conveying passengers by land or water in violation of the preceding section.

The preceding section, it is true, forbids the carrying of such articles on any vessel employed in carrying passengers, but the language of section 234 is general enough to include it. In order that there may be no doubt about it, I move that amendment.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from Utah if that is the section in regard to explosives?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. The Committee on Interstate Commerce, Mr. President, has pending before it a bill covering this matter, which I think will probably be reported in a few days. It establishes the rules and regulations, and does not confine the rules and regulations to such as may be established by any Department whatever. It makes fixed rules and regulations for the transportation of such articles. I should be glad, therefore, to have this section passed over for the present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that the amendment I propose would not interfere with his purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 234 the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the conveyance of any such article upon any vessel or vehicle employed in conveying passengers by land or water in violation of the preceding section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not now consent to lay it aside. We have reached the end of a chapter, and it seems to me to be a good place to suspend our labors.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make a suggestion in connection with this section before laying the bill aside. It will take but a moment. I think we had better not leave this section unfinished.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought it was finished.

Mr. HEYBURN. In view of the fact that the Committee on Interstate Commerce is proposing to amend the existing law, which is specific with reference to the manner of packing, I am going to propose an amendment to the section to strike out, in lines 4 and 5 on page 126, the words "in conformity with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as provided by law," because the law does specifically provide the manner of packing. I move that amendment.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator desire by that to exclude any additional regulations on the part of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do; because Congress has heretofore declined to leave it to such rules and regulations, and in existing law the method is prescribed. The matter is now before the Committee on Interstate Commerce to consider as to whether the present law is sufficient or whether it will be amended. In either event, we have a specific law that is available to everybody at all times and is permanent in its character. It is very much better that that should be the criterion than that changing rules and regulations should govern.

Mr. BACON. I did not make the suggestion with a view to opposing in any manner the amendment offered by the Senator. I simply desired information. It had occurred to me that possibly in a matter of this importance it might be desirable that, in addition to law and not in conflict with, but in furtherance of it, the Secretary might, in some instances, be profitably clothed with power to make such regulations as developments might prove the necessity for; but I yield to the Senator's judgment in the matter and have no motion to make in regard to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think in a case of this kind, dealing with deadly explosives transmitted through the Post-Office Department, there should be such a fixed and settled law that every person might know its terms, and that it ought not to be left to the varying changes of rules and regulations. That has been evidently the judgment of Congress in the past, and it is evidently their judgment now, inasmuch as they are considering—not prescribing that somebody else may make rules and regulations—but considering a change in the fixed provisions of law governing that question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 126, line 4, after the word "packed," it is proposed to strike out "in conformity with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor" and insert "as provided by law."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that that amendment will accomplish what the Senator from Idaho desires to accomplish, because the provisions of law with reference to the packing of these articles are contained in the very section for which section 234 is a substitute, and that section is repealed. So if we pass the pending section in the form suggested, we will have no existing provision of law on that subject. It seems to me that what ought to be done, if that is the desire of the Senate, is to substitute section 5355 of the Revised Statutes for section 234 of the pending bill, because it is section 5355 which prescribes the way in which these articles shall be packed, and that section will be repealed by the adoption of section 234, leaving no provision of law on the subject at all. If the motion is proper, I move as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that section 234 be amended by substituting therefor the matter contained in section 5355 of the Revised Statutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose to strike out all of the section and insert a new section in lieu of it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On pages 125 and 126 it is proposed to strike out all of section 234 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

> Every person who knowingly ships, sends, or forwards any quantity of the articles mentioned in section 5353, or who transports the same by any mode of conveyance upon land or water, between any of the places specified in that section——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The words "in that section" should be changed to read "in the preceding section."

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the amendment, as follows:

> In the preceding section, unless such articles be securely inclosed, deposited, or packed in a metallic vessel surrounded by plaster of paris, or other nonexplosive material when saturated with such oil, and separated from all other substances, and the outside of the package be marked, printed, or labeled in a conspicuous manner with the words "nitroglycerine; dangerous," shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000; one-half to the use of the informer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Strike out "one-half to the use of the informer," and add the proviso which I offered to section 234.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. I withdraw my amendment and accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Idaho will consent that we may lay the bill aside, as we have reached the end of a chapter.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in consequence of a number of letters which I have received relative to an order issued by the Post-Office Department, known as "Order 907," amending the regulations pertaining to second-class matter, I addressed a letter to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General asking his reasons for it and some information as to the operation of it, particularly as to that part of the order which concerns the renewal of subscriptions to newspapers, there being a very great interest all through the country in regard to the matter. The purpose of the order was to prevent abuses with respect to second-class mail matter.

I have received from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General a very clear statement in regard to the whole matter, discussing all the provisions of the order, the reasons for it, and pointing out in what way there will not be the anticipated hardship that was suggested, not only to me, but to many other Senators and Representatives, as the result of this order.

I now hold that letter of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General in my hand, to which there are appended many exhibits in the way of discussions by publishing houses and newspaper publishers, and so forth, giving their views as to the way in which the law will operate, and some other exhibits of the same kind, together with an address delivered by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General upon that subject before a company of publishers, as I understand.

For the convenience of Senators and also of Representatives—I presume they will be glad to avail themselves of it—I ask that this letter, with the accompanying exhibits, may be printed as a document. The matter is so voluminous in its scope that it is impossible for Senators and Representatives to respond, with a proper degree of particularity, to the inquiries which are made in regard thereto. If put in print, we can very easily handle it to the satisfaction of all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the paper presented by him may be printed as a document.

Mr. BACON. I am not sufficiently familiar, right at this moment, to know how many copies that order will justify, but my friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] can doubtless tell us. I think a great many more than the usual number are going to be required.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator can ask for additional copies after he gets the document printed in the first place.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. After it is printed in the first place he can ask for an additional number of copies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it will embrace about 1,100 copies.

Mr. BACON. As suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, the request for the additional number had better be postponed until the original print has been made, and then a request will be made for additional copies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 14, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 13, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14766) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 5: That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 5.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

After the word "Treasury," at the end of said amendment, insert the following:

"Whenever any defendant in the case herein described makes affidavit, setting forth that there are witnesses whose evidence is material to his defense; that he can not safely go to trial without them; what he expects to prove by each of them; and that he is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the court may in its discretion order that such witnesses be paid as herein provided.

"All witnesses subpœnaed and appearing for the Government and those appearing for the defense as above authorized, in the case mentioned in this paragraph, shall be paid out of said appropriations the per diem fees allowed by law to witnesses in other cases, together with actual, reasonable expenses of travel incurred in coming from and returning to their places of residence which said actual expenses shall be sworn to and shall be subject to the inspection, revision, and approval of the court and shall be in lieu of mileage now authorized by law to witnesses in other cases; and the tender of a sum sufficient to cover such actual expenses and the per diem fees shall be as effective for all purposes as the tender of mileage and per diem now allowed by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "To pay balance due the Atlanta Machine Works, of Atlanta, Georgia, four hundred and twenty-eight dollars and two cents," and the Senate agree to the same.

J. A. TAWNEY,
EDWARD B. VREELAND,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 14766, making appropriation to supply urgent deficiencies, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment numbered 5: Strikes out the appropriation of $1,875 proposed by the Senate for payment to J. H. Bankhead as a member of the Inland Waterways Commission.

On amendment numbered 11: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate relating to the Hyde, Dimon, Benson, and Schneider case, and adds a further provision authorizing the payment of witnesses on the part of the defense under certain conditions and in the discretion of the court, and also providing that all witnesses in the case, both for the Government and the defense, shall receive, in addition to their per diem fees, only actual traveling expenses instead of mileage, as provided by law in other cases.

On amendment numbered 26: Provides for the payment of $428.02 as a balance due the Atlanta Machine Works, of Atlanta, Ga., instead of that sum of money claimed as interest on the principal of a judgment rendered in their behalf by the United States court at Atlanta, Ga.

J. A. TAWNEY,
EDWARD B. VREELAND,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report, and I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, since the discussion in the House on day before yesterday, I have visited the Department of Justice and ascertained from the Attorney-General that the reason why this case was brought in the District of Columbia instead of in California was that the offense with which the defendants are charged was outlawed in the State of California before the Department or any officers of the Government had discovered the frauds constituting the crime; so that the defendants could not be tried in California, and the only place where the indictments could be brought or the venue could be laid was here. As the committee has agreed upon an amendment which I think removes the possibility of our being a party to a proceeding which might work irreparable injustice to somebody, I do not desire, under the circumstances, further to object to the House receding from its position.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word in explanation of the provision in regard to the Hyde-Benson case. On investigation the conferees on the part of the House ascertained that since 1846 it has been the policy of the Government where the defendants in criminal actions made a showing to the court as to the witnesses they desired and to their being necessary, and that they were unable to provide for their attendance, the court in its discretion is permitted to authorize the subpœnaing of their witnesses residing within 100 miles of the place of trial. The reason for that policy is much stronger in this case, when you consider that the witnesses in this case will have to be brought here, some 3,000 miles. We also ascertained that under the law witnesses on behalf of the Government as well as the defense would be entitled to 5 cents per mile for travel, in addition to their per diem. That, in the judgment of the conferees, is a great deal more than is necessary to defray the actual traveling expenses. In fact, it has been said that some of the relatives of some of the witnesses are preparing to visit the East, claiming that they can do so on the mileage and witness fees of those subpœnaed. The paragraph in the report which I will read explains very fully the exact provision for the pay of the witness in this case, whether appearing for the Government or the defendants.

Whenever any defendant in the case herein described makes affidavit, setting forth that there are witnesses whose evidence is material to his defense; that he can not safely go to trial without them; what he expects to prove by each of them; and that he is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the court may in its discretion order that such witnesses be paid as herein provided.

All witnesses subpœnaed and appearing for the Government, and those appearing for the defense as above authorized, in the case mentioned in this paragraph, shall be paid out of said appropriations the per diem fees allowed by law to witnesses in other cases, together with actual, reasonable expenses of travel incurred in coming from and returning to their places of residence, which said actual expenses shall be sworn to and shall be subject to the inspection, revision, and approval of the court and shall be in lieu of mileage now authorized by law to witnesses in other cases; and the tender of a sum sufficient to cover such actual expenses and the per diem fees shall be as effective for by law.

So, for that reason, Mr. Speaker, we have modified the law in regard to fees and traveling expenses as to the Government's witnesses, as well as the defendants' witnesses in this case, providing for their actual traveling expenses, to be sworn to, and to be modified or revised and approved by the court. In that way, I think, the expense of the trial, if it is had here, will be very materially reduced.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. If it is a good and necessary thing to modify the allowance for witnesses in this case, would it not be an equally commendable action to revise the law generally in that particular?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think so; but that is a question that should be addressed to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, while I indorse the sentiment of the conferees, I think this House ought to emphasize the fact that we disapprove of bringing cases from the Pacific coast to this city when it can possibly be avoided. The witnesses for both parties and the assistant United States attorneys must all come here. And this is an enormous and an unnecessary expense. The crimes were committed there, and they should be tried there in order to save expense. That is not all. There is a constitutional right of the defendants in criminal suits, a right that ought to be regarded by this House, that they should be tried where the crimes are committed. The House ought to emphasize its disapproval of that course whenever possible.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the remarks just made by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] we all concur in, except that he assumes that where parties live they commit the crime.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. KEIFER. He said we ought to protest against bringing people from the Pacific coast here for trial. We have always done that. The Constitution prohibits that. The laws of the country prohibit that. If the people from the Pacific coast come to the District of Columbia and commit a crime, they will have to come here and answer for it.

I want to ask the chairman [Mr. TAWNEY] one question, and that is, whether in the last amendment agreed to, No. 26, the amendment is so drawn in connection with the bill that the receipt of the $428.02 shall be accepted in full of the balance due the Atlanta Machine Works?

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand the gentleman is now satisfied.

Mr. KEIFER. Is the provision such that if this House accepted that it will be satisfactory?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] about the allowance of interest on the judgment.

Mr. TAWNEY. We do not provide for payment of any interest on the judgment. We provide for the payment of the balance due on the judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. But that balance is interest, is it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is claimed as interest, but this provision does not recognize it as interest, and it can never be used as a precedent hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The Government does not allow interest, does it?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. MANN. Except in this case.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF GAME IN ALASKA.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill H. R. 14789 is upon the Union Calendar, and unanimous consent is asked to discharge that committee from the consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House at this time. The Clerk will report the bill.

[The bill was read at length.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I noticed in the latter part of the reading of the bill that any officer of the United States is authorized to arrest any person having a skin, etc., of game taken in Alaska, anywhere in the United States. I would ask the gentleman if I am right, if the interpretation is as broad as that, and if such drastic legislation is necessary in order to protect the game in Alaska?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that it does provide that "any marshal, deputy marshal, or warden in or out of Alaska may arrest without warrant any person found violating any of the provisions of this act, or of any regulations herein provided." And that is the law now. That is simply a reenactment of the present law.

Mr. PAYNE. What changes are there in this law?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The changes in this law from the present law are these: That under present conditions the Secretary of Agriculture has control of the game laws in Alaska. This bill provides for a license system and places it under the control of the governor.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why should it not be under the control of the governor of Alaska?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It does place it under the control of the governor.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then what has the Secretary of Agriculture to do with it, anyhow?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Secretary of Agriculture, under this bill, has nothing to do with it; but he has under the present law. The object of this bill is to charge a license, and the proceeds of that license will go in a game fund, to be used for game protection, and placed under the control of the governor of Alaska.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it true that if a man had a deerskin that came from Alaska, he could be arrested in the District of Columbia? Is that true?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, I would not want to say that. I can read what it does. The object of the provision in the law, as I understand it and as it is to-day, is this: That it provides that any marshal or deputy marshal or warden may arrest, without warrant, any person found violating any of the provisions of this act, whether it be in Alaska or in California.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If he affirms that it came from Alaska, why I could be arrested in the District without having to go back there to be tried.

Mr. PAYNE. That would not have to be affirmed. It would only have to be charged that it came from Alaska. All that he has got to do is to affirm that it came from Alaska.

Mr. SULZER. That law ought to be amended.

Mr. PAYNE. This seems to be a splendid opportunity to change that drastic provision.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It seems to me we might strike that clause out.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CRUMPACKER rose.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can not yield to all gentlemen at once.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to make a suggestion about the rules and regulations proposed. The law authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to make certain rules and regulations, and that is the law now. Does not the provision say that any person who violates any provision of the law, any regulation made by the governor or the Secretary of Agriculture, shall be guilty of a crime? This law as it now is puts it in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I infer and understand from its reading that the law prohibits the killing of game during certain seasons and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture, under certain rules and regulations, to permit the killing during those seasons for certain purposes. If that be true, I think the rules and regulations are all right. But if it permits the Secretary of Agriculture to make rules and regulations in addition to the provisions of this law and then undertakes to make those a basis of crime, then I think it is wrong. What does it do in that respect?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that this bill very much restricts it in that respect over the present law. It says he shall make rules and regulations, under the provisions of this bill, to this effect only: That he shall prescribe different times for the killing of the game. This vests the control of the season in him. They discovered that the caribou were about to be exterminated on the Kenai Peninsula, and the only way of restricting them was to prescribe a period of two years, while in the other the period is of five years. It was found necessary to leave that much discretion in the hands of the Secretary.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I agree that it is necessary to vest great discretion, and it would be convenient in an administrative officer of the Government, and it would be impracticable to meet all these phases in a bill enacted by Congress, but the question of convenience is not one to be considered as much. It is largely a question of power and administration. I have always opposed the authorizing of Department officials to make regulations that furnish the basis of a criminal prosecution. I believe the protection of the liberty of the people of the United States is of as much importance as the protection of game in Alaska, and probably a little more. But I understand now, as I said a moment ago, the power of the Secretary of Agriculture is to make rules and regulations as within the prohibited period fixed by the law, and the Secretary may prescribe that game may be killed within the prohibited period in some districts. Then it is a proper thing to do.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; he can not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I understand from a hasty reading of the bill that it authorizes a permanent indefinite appropriation. Before I can consent to the creation of any more permanent indefinite appropriations, I want to know what they are, and for the present I will object.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection. This does not carry any appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does appropriate, for fees, a permanent indefinite appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers in any examination within its jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16493) limiting and restricting the right of entry and assignment under the desert-land law and authorizing an extension of time within which to make final proof, with two minor amendments to correct errors in printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the right to make entry of desert lands under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1877, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories," as amended by the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," shall be restricted to surveyed public lands of the character contemplated by said acts, and no such entries of surveyed lands shall be allowed or made of record: Provided, however, That any individual qualified to make entry of desert lands under said acts who has, prior to survey, taken possession of a tract of unsurveyed desert land not exceeding in area 320 acres in compact form, and has reclaimed or has in good faith commenced the work of reclaiming the same, shall have the preference right to make entry of such tract under said acts, in conformity with the public land surveys, within ninety days after the filing of the approved plat of survey in the district land office.

SEC. 2. That from and after the date of the passage of this act no assignment of an entry made under said acts shall be allowed or recognized, except it be to an individual who is shown to be qualified to make entry under said acts of the land covered by the assigned entry, and such assignments may include all or part of an entry; but no assignment to or for the benefit of any incorporation or association shall be authorized or recognized.

SEC. 3. That any entrymen under the above acts who shall show to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that he has in good faith complied with the terms, requirements, and provisions of said acts, but that because of some unavoidable delay in the construction of the irrigating works, intended to convey water to the said lands, he is, without fault on his part, unable to make proof of the reclamation and cultivation of said land, as required by said acts, shall, upon filing his corroborated affidavit with the land office in which said land is located, setting forth said facts, be allowed an additional period of not to exceed three years, within the discretion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, within which to furnish proof as required by said acts of the completion of said work.

With the following amendments:

Page 1, line 12, strike out "surveyed" and insert "unsurveyed."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. PAYNE. I want to reserve the right to object to this.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the House will allow me about five minutes, and give me their attention, I think I can explain this bill fully.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to make a statement for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman if this bill has the approval of a committee of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill contemplates certain restrictions of the desert-land law, which were originally suggested by the General Land Office, and which have been carefully considered by the Committee on the Public Lands and unanimously indorsed by that committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Has it been indorsed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. MONDELL. The proposed changes have the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior.

The provisions of the first two sections of the bill were embraced in a bill passed at the last session of Congress and discussed on the floor at length and approved by the House; so that the only new matter contained in the bill is the provision in the third section, under which the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, in his discretion, upon a proper showing on the part of the entryman of inability to complete his irrigating work within the three years allowed by law, grant an extension such as may be necessary, not exceeding three years, in which to complete the work necessary to the irrigation and the reclamation of the lands.

This legislation is important and necessary. The land officials have on various occasions called attention to the difficulty of administering the desert-land law and do justice and equity, owing to the fact that under the law the entryman should complete his work within three years, and if reclamation is not completed within four years from the date of entry his title is extinguished.

It often occurs, and more frequently now than in former times, that owing to the very great expense of reclamation, the distance that water must be brought for the reclamation of land, the rough territory over which ditches are carried, the broken character of much of the land irrigated, it is utterly impossible for the ordinary entryman, by the exercise of the utmost diligence, to complete the reclamation of his land within the period provided by law.

In numerous instances our committee has been appealed to to pass special bills to extend the period, and the House has passed upon a number of bills of that character. In a late Congress a bill extending for three years the period in behalf of certain entrymen in southern Colorado was passed.

Mr. BONYNGE. In California.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is correct. We also passed a bill a short time before that with reference to Colorado. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] is fully informed on this subject, having given it much attention, and this provision of the bill is substantially a bill introduced by him. To sum up, Mr. Speaker, the first two sections contain proper restrictions on desert entry, restrictions indorsed by the Department and which our committee has unanimously reported twice, the House having passed such a bill in the last Congress. The third section provides for the necessary extension of time upon proper showing in order that the entryman may not lose his land because of his inability to complete the irrigation in the brief period allowed by law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does this bill involve any extension of the irrigation system?

Mr. MONDELL. No extension. It simply provides that where the entryman is on the land under the present law, and in a given case he is unable to complete the irrigation within the three years provided by law, the Commissioner may, upon a proper showing, give him a reasonable period in which to complete the work.

Mr. HARDWICK. The reason that I asked the question is that in a recent case, Kansas against Colorado, 206 United States, the Supreme Court——

Mr. MONDELL. This can not possibly affect that question, because it does not provide for any irrigation that is not already provided for by law.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. This bill relates exclusively to the desert lands and to irrigation and reclamation of those lands. I would like to know if this subject has ever been referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the rules of the House, bills of this character have always been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. There has never been any exception to that rule, and under the rules this bill could have gone nowhere except to the Public Lands Committee, for it deals entirely with the passing of title under certain conditions and does not, like the national irrigation law, deal with the manner in which the land shall be irrigated. So the bill could have gone to no other committee. It was before our committee in two Congresses, and the first provisions were passed by the House without objection in the last Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. If I recollect the rule, all bills relating to the irrigation of public lands go to that committee. I think that committee would have jurisdiction of the bill, and it might have been referred to that committee. Perhaps the Committee on the Public Lands also has jurisdiction.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I will gladly yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. I understand the bill has the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. MONDELL. More than that, Mr. Speaker; two provisions of the bill have been recommended or suggested by the President's Public Land Commission, by the Commissioners, and by the Secretary and indorsed by the House. The last provision has been indorsed and recommended by the present Commissioner, the present Secretary, and approved by the committee.

Mr. REEDER. Does the gentleman say that the bill has received the unanimous report of the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and we have gone over it very carefully.

Mr. REEDER. I want to say, in regard to the suggestion by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that I believe there is a mistake in referring this class of bills to the Committee on the Public Lands, because I think the whole object of the bill is irrigation.

Mr. MANN. This bill has nothing to do with irrigation.

Mr. REEDER. It has all to do with it.

Mr. BONYNGE. It has nothing to do with the Government project of irrigation, but only to the irrigation by individuals.

Mr. REEDER. All matters pertaining to irrigation should be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. I realize that this is not the time to make this point; and inasmuch as it has the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Public Lands, I have no doubt that it is all right.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the rules, all bills relating "to the lands of the United States" go to the Committee on the Public Lands. This is such a bill, and it clearly belongs to our committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CITY OF WOODWARD, OKLA.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12773) granting to the city of Woodward, in the State of Oklahoma, lot 2, in block 48, for park and other public purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. This bill seems to be upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. FULTON. Well, it has been favorably reported by the committee.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we can not take up bills on the Private Calendar by unanimous consent.

Mr. FULTON. It should not be on the Private Calendar, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Oklahoma that in the last two Congresses, and so far in this Congress, the Chair has not submitted requests for unanimous consent to consider bills on the Private Calendar. That is the method the Chair takes of objecting. The Chair will not take the time to explain to the gentleman why, but Members generally understand the position of the Chair.

Mr. FULTON. I had no idea that it was on the Private Calendar and I do not think it belongs there.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16882, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia as to what disposition of time he wishes, conceding that we go on in general debate the remainder of the day.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I desire to have two hours and thirty minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The remainder of the time to be given to this side. Then do I understand that we can close general debate to-day?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman gives me that time, that is satisfactory.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate close to-day, two hours and a half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the balance by myself.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate close to-day, two hours and a half of that time to be in the control of the gentleman from Georgia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] such time as he may wish.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, Members of Congress and the public generally were greatly interested in the recent decision of the Supreme Court which held that the law regulating the liability of interstate railroads to their employees, passed by the last Congress, was unconstitutional. The popular impression produced by the decision, so far as I have been able to estimate it, is that the power of Congress over interstate commerce has been unexpectedly and undesirably limited and that this class of legislation has received a serious setback. I think this impression is quite unwarranted and comes from a superficial view of the decision, and that really the opinions delivered by the judges strengthen the power of Congress over interstate commerce. The law was held unconstitutional because in its terms it extends to employees engaged in purely State commerce. Whether this was the intent of the persons who drew the bill I do not know. They may have thought it wise to draw it as comprehensive as possible, as that would be the only way of ascertaining to what extent Congress could go, but I think few Members of this House supposed it applied to purely State commerce, or thought such an application was constitutional.

The judges of the Supreme Court differed in their interpretation of the law, the majority holding that it did in terms cover State commerce and the minority holding that it did not; but all the judges agreed that Congress had not the power to legislate over employees engaged in purely State commerce, so that question is settled, and settled I believe in accord with the general sentiment and expectation of the bar, of Congress, and of the people.

But while the court has thus decided that this particular statute was unconstitutional, its decision has established one principle which ought to give the friends of this class of legislation ample compensation for their disappointment. That is the principle that the relation of employees to the railroads, of master to servant, as lawyers call it, is within the jurisdiction of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, whenever the servant is engaged in interstate business. This principle has been much disputed and until this decision has been in doubt, but now six judges unite in confirming the doctrine and the other three simply decline to express an opinion, so that a strong majority, if not the full court, indorse it. This is of great value, for of course this principle is vital to the law, and to have it officially established is solace for a little delay.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts as to whether or not the proposition to which he now refers is not more or less in the nature of a dictum. The real issue is the constitutionality of the act, and the court held it unconstitutional on other grounds, so that in a sense this proposition may be more or less dictum.

Mr. GILLETT. It is a dictum, I admit, because it was not necessarily involved in the decision, but it is a dictum upon which six of the judges agree. It was not a dictum as far as the four minority judges are concerned, for the doctrine was a necessary foundation of their argument, and two of the majority judges expressly declare their acquiescence in the doctrine, and the three other judges expressly reserve their opinion. In other words, they apparently are in doubt, so that we may fairly say, I think, that six of the judges of the court are committed to it and the other three are doubtful.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That proposition applies to all the employees of the Government.

Mr. GILLETT. It does, of course.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Whether in manufacturing or otherwise employed.

Mr. GILLETT. That would apply to all.

It will now be simple to amend the law in conformity with this decision—to make it in terms apply exclusively to interstate commerce, and thus to accomplish all that most of its friends expected. In drafting this new law care should be exercised that it does not again exceed our constitutional limits, that it should conform to the decision of the Supreme Court, and, in my opinion, there are other modifications which could be introduced to the improvement of the bill.

But my main purpose in speaking to-day was not to discuss the recent decision of the court, but to take advantage of the present interest in the subject to impress upon the House that there are other bills upon this subject quite as deserving as this one. Railroad employees are already protected by legislation of the individual States, and this only gives them a law somewhat more favorable than most of them had before, and which is uniform throughout the country.

But there is a class of men who have no remedy at all and who not only get no advantage from the ameliorating statutes which a sense of justice has forced upon nearly all of the States, but who can not even appeal to the old common law, with its antiquated master and servant doctrine, and who constitute, I believe, the only force of workingmen in the country who have absolutely no redress for any injury which may happen to them in the course of their employment. I refer to the thousands of men who are employed by the United States in its numerous manufacturing establishments.

These men as yet have not been touched at all by the liberal spirit of the modern statutes. They still have no right to recover damages, even if their injuries resulted solely from the negligence of their employer or from defects in the buildings or machinery. No matter how blameless they were, no matter how culpable the employer, they must bear the loss alone and have no appeal to any law, no redress in any court.

Before we enact law giving still more protection to the railroad employes, who already are much protected, would it not be fair and reasonable and right to do something for these men who have no protection at all? My attention was drawn to this subject years ago, because there is located in the city where I live a Government armory employing between one and two thousand men, nearly all skilled mechanics, and a large portion of them using machinery. Accidents frequently happen to them, but, no matter how they may be caused, they have no redress in law. It is an anachronism that such a state of affairs should exist.

The President has, in several messages, called attention to it, and in his last message discusses it at length. The first executive suggestion of it so far as I am aware was in the report of Hon. W. H. Moody in 1902, when he was Secretary of the Navy, directing the attention of Congress to the need of such action for the navy-yards. But long before there had been any Presidential suggestion I had, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, introduced practically the same bill which I advocate to-day, and had pressed it upon the Judiciary Committee and have urged it in every Congress since. Last year the subcommittee reported it favorably, and I hope this year it will become a law. It is modeled on our Massachusetts statute, and is much more conservative and moderate than the railroad law enacted last year. But I have no prejudice in favor of my own bill. I am willing it should be amended or liberalized or narrowed as much as may be thought wise. What I want is that some action shall be taken, that these men shall have some legal rights. That there is need of it, you can not doubt. Cases which demand it are occurring constantly.

There is now in the hospital at Springfield a young man with a bullet wound in his leg received while he was working at his bench in the armory. In the room below they were testing rifles. The ceiling was not sufficiently armored and a shot glancing upward from the target went through the floor and stopped in this workman's leg. He was guilty of no negligence, was in the performance of his duty, and in any other shop would have had a clear case of damages against his employer. But because he was working for the United States Government he is remediless and can exact no compensation.

I think that the Government ought to abandon this exemption from doing justice which the law now gives it, that when it becomes a manufacturer it ought not at the same time to assert the privileges of a sovereign and claim that it is above the law, and that before it says to railroad corporations, "You shall be more liberal to your employees," it ought at least to have conscience enough to give to its own employees what every railroad employee already enjoys.

If it extracts the beam from its own eye, it may be able to see more clearly the motes in other eyes, and so I think honor, consistency, justice, and the spirit of the age all demand that we give at once to this large body of deserving citizens at the very least the same rights that every other class of citizens already enjoys under the law.

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. You have stated that a bill of this character has been before Congress for a number of years and at one time was reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary. Will you please tell the country why this bill has not been passed that you are talking about now?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish I knew myself just why it has not been passed. I suppose the main reason is there were not enough persons affected by it and interested in it. Like a great many other just and meritorious bills, it never has been able to get the time of Congress, and the purpose of my now addressing the committee is that it may get the attention of Congress. [Applause.] I am glad to see the gentleman thinks it is unreasonable that it has not been already passed.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that the gentleman has introduced a bill at this session relating to this question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Giving the right of action to these employees?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to know if the gentleman's attention was called to a bill introduced a few days ago by myself not giving a right of action to the employees, but giving a compensation where the injury occurred not through negligence of the employee, fixing the minimum amount of compensation, the amount allowed to be determined by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; have you seen that bill?

Mr. GILLETT. I have not seen that bill, and I have no pride in authorship in my own bill to prevent my supporting any other which aims to accomplish the same result and right this wrong.

Mr. STERLING. I asked the gentleman if he has ever considered the question along this line, and I wanted to know what his views are in reference to such a bill.

Mr. GILLETT. I have not heard of such a proposition. All I want, Mr. Chairman, is a remedy, and if the gentleman's bill affords that and the House prefers it, I am perfectly willing to unite upon that. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LITTLEFIELD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 12420. An act to extend immediate transportation privileges to the subport of Alburg, in the customs collection district of Vermont.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14786) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 24.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey and examination to be made of Beaufort Harbor, North Carolina, with a view to improving the navigability thereof, and providing a channel of 8-feet depth from the channel at the bulkhead in the Newport River to the town of Beaufort and from the town of Beaufort to the channel at Gallants Point, and to submit estimates therefor.

Senate concurrent resolution 26.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of the mouth of Chickasabogue Creek, in the State of Alabama, with a view to opening the same, and to submit estimates therefor.

Senate concurrent resolution 27.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination and survey to be made of Bayou Le Batre, in the State of Alabama, with a view to deepening the same, and to submit estimates therefor.

Senate concurrent resolution 30.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring); That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey contiguous to the town of Morehead City, N. C., beginning at the mouth of Hard Scrabble Slough, running westwardly between the said town and the marshes in front of the same, to the main channel of Bogue Sound, in the west of Sandy Point Shoals, with a view of estimating the cost of obtaining a channel in said part of Bogue Sound 100 feet in width and of a depth of 5, 8, and 10 feet at low water.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for one hour. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, within the last few days we have been edified by a series of somewhat remarkable speeches, evidencing a high order of ability in our membership, on which I most heartily congratulate the country, for no man more rejoices in the honor and glory of this House than I do. These speeches have been devoted chiefly to a discussion of the President's message and of the President himself. Views widely divergent as the poles have been freely expressed as to the merits and demerits of this extraordinary man, one of the most extraordinary in American history. [Applause.] In this case, as in most others, the line of safety, fairness, and justice is found in medias res. In my county there was a lawyer who so frequently urged courts and juries to take "a reasonable view" that his saying passed into a proverb. That is exactly what should be done touching the President; but that is precisely what has not been done as a rule. He is such a belligerent personage that his slightest word is a challenge to mortal combat, and he can not express an opinion on any question under heaven, even on a subject so prosaic and threadbare as the prospective state of the weather, without precipitating a row, his extreme admirers declaring that there never has been such a weather prophet on earth since Adam and Eve were driven with flaming swords from Paradise, and his extreme enemies vociferating that he knows no more about the weather than does the ground hog. [Laughter and applause.]

Upon this issue there would be joined a battle royal, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing. Colonel Roosevelt laughs to scorn the words of the great Cardinal:

> Love thyself last; cherish those hearts that hate thee;
> Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace
> To silence envious tongues.

On the contrary, he acts on the theory of the bellicose Irishman who said: "When you see a head, hit it." [Laughter and applause.] He has whacked so many heads that divers reactionary leaders are in the political hospital for repairs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Still others of them perambulate the earth with poultices and plasters adorning their craniums. [Laughter.] His whole public life has been one long succession of spectacular fights. No man was ever more viciously assailed by men of his own party, and none was ever, while still in the flesh, so lavishly lauded by some of the opposing party. But the truth is that this extraordinary man has waxed stronger and stronger by waging battle. Even defeat has made him a larger and more commanding figure. Never in his militant career was he more savagely abused or more extravagantly praised than at the present juncture.

So, amid the swirl of things, the deluge of words, the shoutings of the captains, the beating of tom-toms, the groans of crippled and wounded Republicans, the furious yells of friend and foe, one who is the personal friend of Theodore Roosevelt, the man; who is the opponent of Theodore Roosevelt, the politician or the statesman, as the case may be; and who desires to take a "reasonable view" of the saying and doings of Theodore Roosevelt, the Chief Magistrate of a mighty people, perhaps has little chance to be heard in this Babel of voices. But I will have my say, and here it is: Personally I like him. He has treated me well and I have tried to treat him well. After the manner of strong men he has pronounced virtues and glaring faults of character. I have never abused him. I have never grown hysterical in admiration of him. When he is right, I support him cordially. When he is wrong, I fight him tooth and nail. This line of conduct I have pursued steadfastly in the past, and I shall adhere to it without shadow of turning even unto the end. It seems to me that that is the way in which he would desire to be treated. He must entertain ineffable contempt for the invertebrate sycophants who grovel before him on all occasions, and who, no matter what he says or what he does, throw high their sweaty caps in air, shouting: "Io! Triumphe! Io! Triumphe!"

It is said that "a king can have no friends," and it seems that a President of the United States—any President—is in the same unhappy situation. It is claimed that Colonel Roosevelt is better than his party—this he could easily be without running any imminent risk of being translated, after the fashion of Elijah, in a chariot of fire by reason of his goodness. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But whatever his virtues, whatever his faults, whatever else he may be, he is not a Democrat [applause on the Democratic side]; for democracy means the least amount of government the people can get along with consistent with the fullest enjoyment of their rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness [applause on the Democratic side], while republicanism means the greatest amount of government that the people will stand [applause on the Democratic side], and he of all men is the apostle of the maximum quantity of government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Occasionally, very much to the delight of Democrats and the utter confusion of Republicans, he appropriates or absorbs, borrows or seizes, a Democratic idea and from his high coign of vantage advocates it with tremendous force; for he obeys to the letter at least one Scriptural injunction: "What soever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might;" and it is the heavy hand of Theodore Roosevelt or his "big stick" which has driven so many Republicans pellmell into the Cave of Adullam, where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth and much profane swearing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So far as he has advocated Democratic ideas, so far as he has mauled wicked Republicans with his mailed fist or has thumped them with his big stick, he deserves the unstinted praise and gratitude of all lovers of our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Twice in this speech I have applied to him the word "extraordinary," which seems to me the adjective best fitting his character and his endowments. Whether he is a great man I do not know. You, Mr. Chairman, do not know. Nobody knows. There is an old saying, "Count no man happy till he is dead." It is a wise and sane rule to acclaim no man great until he is in his grave. We have not the perspective necessary to fix his status in history, and it is sheer folly to attempt it. Lord Bacon, the most philosophic of mankind, with clear vision and deep pathos, expressed the same idea in his last will and testament, when he said: "For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches, and to foreign nations, and to the next age." His proud confidence was not misplaced, for his fame has augmented from the day of his death down to the present hour.

Individually, I wish the President well in the White House till March 4, 1909, when I hope he will quit it forever. I congratulate him from the bottom of my heart on turning a deaf ear to those unwise or selfish friends who have endeavored to persuade him to violate the wholesome precedents of one hundred and eleven years, for no President will ever be elected to a third term until the Republic is on its last legs. After he leaves that historic mansion, the goal of so many ambitious hearts, the tomb of so many ardent hopes, I wish him happiness, prosperity, and length of days.

We can all be honest even if we can not be great, and if you Republican bigwigs were perfectly candid, you would confess that you are not nearly so much enamored of the President as you appear to be. You grow red in the face, thereby inviting vertigo or apoplexy in exalting him to the skies; for he is still the dispenser in chief of pie, and a Republican statesman bereft of pie is a spectacle to make the angels weep. When I see you trying to apotheosize him by mere lip service, it seems to me, "The lady doth protest too much."

When a lad I had a classmate who pronounced the Latin word "vulgus," which means "the common people," "voolgoose." By reason of some peculiarity in his vocal apparatus it sounded like "bullgoose." So the boys fell into the habit, as a joke, of pronouncing it "bullgoose." It is the "common people" among the Republicans, the "vulgus" of the Romans, the "bullgoose" of the college boys, that constitute Theodore Roosevelt's shield and buckler among the Republicans. No man has a livelier comprehension of that fact than Republican Representatives.

I have heard that in the last campaign sundry Republican Representatives sought and obtained from the President certificates of good character to help them pull through. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] We all know that when the Republican managers came to the conclusion that the result was doubtful, he wrote that famous letter to "My dear Mr. Watson" which was used as a blanket certificate of good character for all Republican Members of Congress except the unfortunate Mr. Wadsworth. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] But even his epistle to Mr. Watson could not prevent the Republican majority in the House from falling from 114 to 55. When "Uncle Joe" read the returns he must have been in the frame of mind of Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, when surveying a hard-won field, he exclaimed: "Another such victory and we are undone." [Applause on the Democratic side.] A self-evident truth; and even the ready-letter-writer in the White House will not be able to write enough letters between now and the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November next to return another Republican majority to this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Everybody knows that the tide is running strong against you, and any district that is held by a Republican here by less than 3,000 plurality is more liable to go Democratic than Republican, and, God be praised, there are forty-four such districts. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Every Republican holding his seat by less than 2,000 is "our meat" in November. [Laughter and applause.] There are thirty-seven of them, and we only need twenty-eight to organize the next House. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

In addition to these there are fifteen or twenty other districts in which for various reasons we have an equal chance to win.

The other day the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said: "To the Administration of Theodore Roosevelt the student of the future will point as the period when the people came into possession of their own." The gentleman was mistaken. The exact date to which the student of the future will point as that of the coming of the people into their own will be March 4, 1909, when a Democrat will be inaugurated President at the east front of the Capitol, backed by such a Democratic majority in this House as will induce even a Republican Senate to enact into law the people's will. For eleven years we have been out of power, but we have it on high authority that—

> Sweet are the uses of adversity,
> Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
> Wears yet a precious jewel in his head—

in this case the precious jewel of Democratic victory.

The Democrats are getting together everywhere, and the Republican party presents to the astounded gaze of men the appearance of a "dissolving view." [Laughter and applause.] You will be extremely lucky if you get out of Chicago without nominating two Republican tickets instead of one. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I am not going to venture upon any discussion of the financial question. There never have been but two men in the world that knew all about it. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is one of them, and unfortunately the other is dead. [Laughter and applause.] But my friend from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] who made a wonderfully strong speech yesterday, knows a good deal about the financial question, though he modestly disclaimed it. No man that heard him did more to praise him by his action, by his grimaces, by his smiles and nods, than did Mr. HILL of Connecticut; and "praise from Sir Hubert Stanley is praise indeed."

First and last in this debate a great deal has been said about the existing panic. There has been much loud asservation to the effect that the President had no hand in producing it. After all is said that can be said, one fact stands out in bold relief, and that is that it is a Republican panic. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] The self-constituted defenders of the President declare vehemently that Harriman and his crowd did it. Harriman and his crowd retort angrily that the President and his crowd did it. But no difference which one of the two crowds did it, it is "a Republican panic." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]; for, let it never be forgotten that Harriman and his crowd are Republicans, as well as the President and his crowd. It does not become "an innocent bystander" to undertake to decide which are the ideal Republicans. [Laughter.] One thing we do know, however, and that is that Mr. Harriman was a delegate to the last national Republican convention which nominated Colonel Roosevelt by a unanimous vote and that he has been a liberal contributor to Republican campaign funds. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Two or three years ago he was "My dear Harriman." [Laughter.] Now he is another sort of Harriman with a big, big D. [Laughter.] But whatever else he was, or is, he is a Republican of high degree. I am not certain that it is any particular business of mine to pick the Republican nominees for President. Perhaps, however, I may be permitted to suggest that the ideal Republican for Persident would be Edward H. Harriman [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], and if you fill out the Republican ticket with that other eminent Republican, John D. Rockefeller, the ticket will be very strong in Wall street. It will have one advantage. They can furnish their own barrel, and then the Republican rooters instead of singing "rally 'round the flag, boys," can sing "rally 'round the barrel, boys." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] No doubt after Rockefeller pays that $29,000,000 fine, if he ever does, that Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis imposed on him, he will still have oil enough left to grease up the machine. [Laughter.] There would be another advantage in the Harriman and Rockefeller Republican Presidential ticket, and that is, there would be no necessity for them to plunder the great life insurance companies, thereby robbing the widows and orphans of the land of the provision made for them by kind husbands and loving fathers.

There is an old saying that "chickens come home to roost." For eleven years the Democrats have been stripped of every shred of power. In 1893 there was a panic under the McKinley high-tariff bill while a Democrat sat in the White House. Every mother's son of you in the House, in the public press, and upon the stump vociferated volubly and repeatedly that it was a Democratic panic. Now, no man can deny that this panic has come after eleven years of Republican rule, under a Republican Administration, and by your own logic you can not deny that it is a Republican panic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You are estopped from so doing, and you might as well walk up and take your medicine. It is bitter as gall, but you will have to swallow it.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in his speech the other day tried to minimize the panic, and intimated that it is not much of a panic, anyway. I read somewhere once that about the thirtieth day of the flood a stiff-necked antediluvian, sitting in the limbs of a tall tree on the top of a high mountain, as Noah floated past in the ark, shook the water out of his hair and remarked: "This is not much of a shower, after all."

[Laughter.] The gentleman from Iowa must be some blood kin to that cheerful antediluvian. [Laughter.]

I wish it were true that it is not much of a panic. I have not much property, but it has cost me already about one-fourth of what I had. I wish it were true, as he says, that it is not much of a panic; but it is not true, for another distinguished Iowa statesman, ex-governor and ex-Secretary of the Treasury, Leslie M. Shaw, who is a Republican Presidential possibility, in a speech that he made not long ago, used this remarkable language:

Banks must have been sound, or widespread ruin would have marked the stringency of 1907, which is generally conceded to have been the severest the world has ever witnessed.

That is certainly a sweeping statement:

The stringency of 1907, which is generally conceded to have been the severest the world has ever witnessed.

Mr. Shaw might have truthfully added that it is a Republican panic, and gives the lie direct to the Republican platform declaration of 1904, that "a Republican tariff is always followed by business prosperity and a Democratic tariff by business adversity." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That fake is thoroughly exploded—"gone where the woodbine twineth," dead as the men who lived before the flood. It helped you amazingly in 1904. No sane man will believe it any more forever—

All the king's horses and all the king's men
Can't put Humpty Dumpty together again.

[Laughter.]

But the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in a vain endeavor to shift the burden of this panic, said that as long as we went on in the way we have been going we would always have periodical panics, and I believe that my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] the other day indorsed that idea. But why in the name of heaven did not you Republicans say that in 1893 and in the fifteen years that followed? [Applause on the Democratic side.]. That philosophy of the gentleman from Iowa comes too late. It is a kind of deathbed repentance. I will read you another sentence or two:

Mr. President, the financial crisis from which the country has just emerged, which culminated in a serious panic in October, was the most acute and destructive in its immediate consequences of any that has occurred in the history of the country. Nothing but the heroic measures taken by the representatives of the great business and financial interests of the country, acting in cooperation with the Secretary of the Treasury, prevented a total collapse of private credit and a disastrous destruction of all values. It is impossible to conceive, much less to measure, the losses which would have resulted from such a calamity. The country was saved by the narrowest possible margin from an overwhelming catastrophe whose blighting effect would have been felt in every household.

Who do you suppose said that? Mr. ALDRICH, the father of the Aldrich currency bill, in the Senate of the United States. Oh, yes; it is easy to see now what we tried to make you admit in 1893 and afterwards, that panics do come, and that they come periodically, but you denied it then, and you will not be permitted to plead it now in mitigation. There is a sentence in a very old book, "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword," and that is the predicament you are in this day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You all indorse Cortelyou's great remedy for this panic. What was Cortelyou's remedy? The President sent him a letter of congratulation. It is a cold day when he does not send a letter to somebody, somewhere, about something. If he does not finally turn up with a bad case of pen paralysis, I miss my guess. [Laughter.] What was Cortelyou's plan? To issue a new batch of bonds in a time of profound peace, the identical thing for which you Republicans have pilloried a Democratic President for fifteen years. To this complexion has it come at last, that Republican morality, the morality of the great God-and-morality party, in the year of grace 1908, is this: If a Democratic President does a thing, it is wrong. If a Republican President does the same thing, it is right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That, too, when an irresistible moral wave is sweeping over the country from sea to sea. But, for fear somebody thinks I have overdrawn the size of this panic, I will read you a short excerpt from the speech of Governor Leslie M. Shaw, made night before last in Michigan:

Over 300,000 freight cars standing empty on the track; 8,000 locomotives out of commission; one-quarter of the population of several large cities idle, and, for the first time in a Republican Administration, free soup houses.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Republican soup houses! [Laughter.] And yet the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], with banks breaking on every hand; with railroads, mills, factories, stores, and mines throwing men out of employment by the thousands; with laborers fleeing from the country by the tens of thousands for Europe; with suicides multiplying on every hand; with governmental revenues constantly dwindling; with Republican soup houses springing up in great cities like mushrooms in a damp cellar, asks us to disbelieve the evidence of our own senses and say that the panic does not amount to much anyway.

Alexander Pope, one of the chief literary ornaments of Queen Anne's reign, which has been styled "the golden age of English literature," the friend of Swift, Addison, and Bolingbroke, a poet that is not read now nearly as much as he ought to be, in his Universal Prayer says:

That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me.

My Republican brethren, that is precisely what we are going to do to you. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] You might as well get ready for it. [Laughter.] You shall be held accountable for this panic, not only in this year, but through all the years that are to come. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For fifteen long years you have lambasted us without mercy for the panic of 1893, which you accused us of producing. Now, we will lambast you without mercy for the panic of 1907, which you can not deny occurred in the eleventh year of the absolute supremacy of the Republican party. "Sweet is revenge!" And we will have our revenge on you now and in all future time. You can write that upon the tablets of your memory. You can not escape punishment any more than you can escape death itself.

It must be confessed, however, that if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] fell down in his effort to minimize the Republican panic, he succeeded marvelously well in his threat to run his roller over those who oppose the President's recommendations, and to disfigure them. He got quick returns on that threat. While of course he does not aspire to infringe the Rooseveltian patent on "the big stick," Colonel HEPBURN wields a heavy bludgeon of his own and is not too tender about cudgeling recalcitrant Republicans with it. It will be remembered that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in commenting on Colonel HEPBURN's threat, pointed out to him that in order to make good he must run his roller over the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], and Mr. Speaker CANNON. That is quite a large contract, but Colonel HEPBURN has already accomplished part of his stunt by bringing into line the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and ex officio floor leader of the majority.

Lord Byron, a great poet and a fine judge of poetry, pronounces Wolfe's "Burial of Sir John Moore" to be the finest ballad in our language. One of the most striking stanzas in that ballad begins with the famous line, "But half of our heavy task was done." It may not be considered impertinent if I, in the spirit of friendship, remind the gentleman from Iowa that only one-fourth of his heavy task is done and seek to encourage him in the laudable duty he has set himself. Whenever he gets ready to run his roller over the gentleman from Pennsylvania and "Uncle Joe" and to disfigure them, I assure him, if he will give an advance notice, that he will have a huge audience, breathless with expectation and delirious with delight. [Laughter and applause.] There will be something doing on that occasion, and no mistake. Not since the Earl of Peterboro scaled the walls of Barcelona has a "stunt" so ambitious been essayed. [Laughter.]

Colonel HEPBURN has already earned the sobriquet of "Defender of the White House faith" by the valorous manner in which he defended the President from the lofty panegyric pronounced upon him by the brilliant orator from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. He will prove himself somewhat of a crusader, if, single-handed, he undertakes to run his roller over the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and Mr. Speaker CANNON and to disfigure them. If he succeeds, he will win unfading laurels and will deserve to snatch from Marshal Ney the title of "Bravest of the brave," bestowed in a moment of affection and gratitude by Napoleon. From his arduous and extrahazardous undertaking, I wish the gentleman from Iowa a safe deliverance.

Cæsar divides all Gaul into three parts. The speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is susceptible of the same treatment: One-third, delivered in tones that would make old Stentor turn green with envy, might be most appropriately marked "Public;" one-third, spoken in voice so low that only Republican Members could hear and with gestures suggestive of the Reverend Doctor Chadband's "Bless you, my children!" should be labeled "Private;" one-third, uttered in a whisper, apparently for the sole benefit and spiritual instruction of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] may be denominated "confidential." If there is any person about this Capitol who is in sore need of abundant spiritual instruction as to the new Republican evangel of tariff revision, it is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

He is a fixed star of portentous magnitude in the constellation of the stand-patters. He is the stand-pat sheaf to which all other stand-pat sheaves do obeisance, even as Joseph saw things happen in his dream. He is to all other stand-patters what Aaron's rod was to the rods of the magicians. A verbatim copy of his thoughts while our Republican brother from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] was delivering his great tariff-reform speech would make what Horace Greeley denominated "mighty interesting reading," and what Professor Squeers, of Dotheboys Hall, would have characterized as "richness." The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], having seen the light himself, does well to agonize with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], for it is written:

Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance.

But he will be the last to yield—the last to repent. I imagine I see him now, all the rest of them deserting him, standing like James Fitzjames did in his duel with Roderick Dhu, and proclaiming—

Come one, come all! this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I.

Yes, he needs the spiritual consolation and instruction by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. Should the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who is jealous of his mental integrity, ever arise in his place on this floor and unequivocally declare that he is earnestly in favor of general tariff revision downward, the angelic choir should break forth in full chorus:

Sound the loud timbrel, o'er land and o'er sea,
DALZELL is converted, the country is free!

[Prolonged laughter and applause.]

I wish to heaven that I could live till he does that. Then I would take away from Methuselah the honor of being the oldest man that ever lived. Methusaleh would have to tarry several centuries at Jericho cultivating his beard in order to even enter the ring for old men. Hitherto and for some nineteen hundred years the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, as he journeyed from Jerusalem down to Damascus, has been taken and accepted as the ne plus ultra of the sudden and the unexpected; but the historian of our times will record the fact with iron pen upon his glowing page that the sudden and abrupt conversion of stand-patters to tariff revision in 1908 is the most astounding phenomenon of the phenomenal age in which we live.

I beg to suggest, however, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and other converts are somewhat enigmatical in the use of terms in making "the good confession." The gentleman from New York said inter alia: "I do not mind saying to-day that they (that is, the Republicans) will declare for a revision of the tariff," which remark was received with considerable applause on the Republican side. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that "revision of the tariff" and "tariff revision" are equivocal terms, and may mean revision up or revision down. So far as I know, no Republican member of the present Ways and Means Committee, except the scholarly gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], has ever declared in favor of revising the tariff downward. He carries his nerve with him and has the courage of his convictions. But the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], who is an acknowledged expert on all military affairs, and who could give pointers in the art of war to Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar, or Napoleon, but who is decidedly inexpert in economic questions, let the cat out of the bag not long since by declaring that the Republicans would revise the tariff up or down, as they pleased. No doubt the Republicans are preparing for another stupendous confidence game on the people by declaring in their next platform for "tariff revision," without indicating whether the revision is to be up or down. They won in 1896 by a juggle on the financial question. Their solemn pledge to promote an international agreement for the free coinage of silver roped in enough silver Republicans to land William McKinley in the White House. Now they are meditating a juggle on the revision of the tariff as a companion piece to their successful juggle as to coinage.

No doubt we shall have another scientific case of paltering with the people in a double sense—of keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope.

That there are many Republicans—perhaps a third of all Republicans—honestly in favor of revising the tariff downward is beyond all question. If they are seduced by the equivocal promise of tariff revision, and, adhering to the regular Republican organization, enable it to win at the polls, only to find later on that the meaning placed upon the words "tariff revision" by a Republican Congress and a Republican President is "revision up," they will find their situation accurately described in verses 43, 44, and 45 of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, which runs in this wise:

When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none.

Then he saith, I will return into my house from which I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished.

Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation.

Mr. KEIFER. What chapter?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The 12th chapter. You never would find it if I did not tell you where it is. [Prolonged laughter.]

The gentleman from New York also declares in favor of a "maximum and minimum tariff," a term as equivocal as is "tariff revision" or "revision of the tariff." Why did he not vouchsafe to us what his maximum and minimum are to be? Is he in favor of the plan proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to make the minimum 80 per cent of the Dingley rates? Or is he in favor of the proposition of Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota, to make the Dingley rates the minimum and the maximum the blue vault of heaven? If the latter we would be repeating the condemned performance of jumping out of the frying pan into the fire. The gentleman from New York is a learned man and can be precise, when he chooses, in the use of words. I submit in all candor that because in both his propositions touching the tariff he used equivocal terms, one may fairly conclude that there is a large-sized Senegambian concealed in the wood pile, a mammoth rodent in the meal tub.

The gentleman's position seems to be this: Tariff revision and a maximum and minimum tariff should be brought about. The Republicans have had absolute control of all branches of the Government for eleven years and have left undone in this regard that which they ought to have done; but, if the people will only overlook past omissions and give them a new lease of power, they will revise the tariff either up or down and establish a maximum and minimum tariff with the Dingley rates for either the maximum or minimum, he isn't exactly certain which; and American voters are asked to go to the polls and buy these two tariff pigs in a poke.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was hardly fair in his treatment of certain bills introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He seemed to think that the gentleman from Mississippi did not know that "white print paper" is a more comprehensive term than "white paper," which is preposterous, for whatever the gentleman from New York may think of the political opinions of the gentleman from Mississippi, he must admit that the latter is possessed of much erudition and is widely read not only in political literature, but in general literature—facts of which this House is proud. Writing "white paper" for "white print paper" was a slip of the pen—merely that, and nothing more. But suppose that the gentleman from Mississippi had actually proposed to put all "white paper" on the free list or to cut down the tariff thereon, what then? He would have been simply pushing a good thing a little further. The effort the gentleman put forth to make merry as to that small item shows to what sore straits the Republican floor leader is reduced in a tariff debate with the gentleman from Mississippi.

The gentleman from New York seems to be flatly opposed to removing the tariff on wood pulp and white print paper. He was kindly furnished by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] with a letter from the Census Bureau showing that prices for white print paper are getting lower instead of higher. We should not forget that a certain Commissioner of Labor, Hon. Carroll D. Wright, now president of a New England college, two or three years ago, to help the Republican campaign along, prepared lengthy tables of figures to show that the cost of living was lower then than in the years immediately preceding, when every housewife knew by sad experience that it was much higher. No doubt this year some Republican statistician will prove that times were better since September last than ever before in the entire history of the human race, thereby once more illustrating the proposition that while figures will not lie, liars will figure.

The gentleman from New York appears to think that the publishers of the land do not know what is the matter with themselves.

I have not time to-day to go into an argument about removing the tariff on wood pulp and print paper. I may do so at some future day; but one thing is certain, either the publishers of the land are a lot of consummate liars—which I do not believe—or the price of news paper has gone up and is higher than it ought to be, for with almost unanimous voice, without regard to politics, they declare that the price is cruelly high and demand that wood pulp and news paper be put upon the free list. Republican papers have it in their power to drive Republicans here into giving them relief or to drive the Republicans out of Congress; and if they do not do the one thing or the other, they should forever hold their peace, for every Democrat here stands ready to vote for their relief. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] properly characterized the tariff on wood pulp and news paper and on art as a tax on intelligence, which should therefore be removed.

The gentleman from New York was muddled as to the bill of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to cut the tariff when above 100 per cent down to 100 per cent. He talked exclusively about tobacco and alcohol, on which there is a large internal-revenue tax. The history of that transaction is that in the Commitee on Ways and Means Mr. WILLIAMS amended his bill so that where there was an internal-revenue tax on any article the tariff should be left high enough to compensate for the internal-revenue tax, even though the tariff on that article should be more than 100 per cent. As amended, it was voted down in committee, all the Democrats voting for it and all the Republicans voting against it. I have here a long list of articles on which the tariff is more than 100 per cent, in some cases much more. At some convenient season I will go into that matter in extenso.

Just one more thought about the tariff, and then I am through with that to-day. Some time during the session I will take a day off and make a sure-enough tariff speech.

Not long since my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], in a running-fire debate with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] about ship subsidies, wanted to know if it was not true that our shipping shrank more under free-trade legislation than under protective legislation. I take it that was a slip of the tongue. The gentleman from Maine is a great figure in this House. He understands the use of the English language, too, and he knows, none better, that there never has been a time that this country was under free-trade legislation under the Constitution, except a few days between Washington's inauguration and the enactment of the first tariff law. I submit that a man with the standing of the gentleman from Maine, one who speaks like the centurion of the Bible, with authority, and "saith to this one 'go,' and he goeth, and to another 'come,' and he cometh," has no right to use words in such a reckless manner as that. It may do for some obscure and ignorant brother, but will not do for the distinguished gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York twitted us with not having passed any legislation in the last forty years. I have very little money; that thing which he suggests has bothered me a long time; but I will give the gentleman a thousand dollars if he will tell me how a minority can outvote a majority in any legislative body on earth. [Laughter.] That is the problem we have all been working on here for years.

Republicans in this House will not be permitted to create the false impression that Republicans throughout the country are a unit in indorsing either the President's message or the President's conduct in his support of Mr. Secretary Taft in his White House aspirations. On the eastern border of Missouri is St. Louis, the great "City of the Iron Crown." There is published the Globe-Democrat, the Republican organ for eastern Missouri, southern Illinois, and adjoining territory. On February 1, closing a long and unfriendly editorial on the message, the Globe-Democrat says:

The general judgment with regard to this special message can hardly fail to be that it is ill-timed and ill-tempered. Nobody questions the President's motives or purposes, but, unfortunately, his methods are now and then such as to invite criticism from his friends and give comfort to his enemies.

That is the deliberate editorial judgment of the Globe-Democrat, the greatest Republican paper in the Mississippi Valley.

February 3 there appeared in the Globe-Democrat an editorial "squib" in these words:

There is a widespread belief that the world is steadily growing better and that business confidence, if it must be disturbed, should not be attacked in a fiery spirit.

The man must be dull indeed who does not see that that is an unfriendly charge against the President.

In the same column we find this paragraph, which needs a diagram to explain it:

"Go softly and carry a big stick" is a phrase that has attracted much attention. The advice contained in the first two words should not be slighted.

It seems to mean that the President is traveling at too rapid a gait and should use the soft pedal hereafter in making music for Republicans to dance to.

The Globe-Democrat is represented in this city by two bright young men who, it may be reasonably assumed, are in full sympathy with the policies of that paper. On February 1 they sent a telegram to the Globe-Democrat which was printed with great black headlines in these words:

Message was prop to Taft, is opinion—Roosevelt's document only for partisan purpose, Republicans believe—Congress to ignore it—Telegrams from various points congratulate President—More messages expected.

The full text of the telegram is as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1908.

A strange and significant phase of present political conditions is found in the fact that no Republican of prominence in Congress has come forward with the declaration that President Roosevelt's special message of yesterday was written for any other than a partisan or personal purpose.

No credit is given to the President by his party's legislative leaders for motives aside from those of a political nature. While opinion continued to vary as to the circumstances which impelled Mr. Roosevelt to pen this most remarkable document, there seems to be general unanimity in the view that its object was to produce a marked effect upon the deliberations of the forthcoming national convention of the Republican party.

PLAN TO STRENGTHEN TAFT.

Yesterday the most common interpretation of the message among Senators and Representatives was that it revived the chance that the President would be renominated.

How that suggestion must cause the iron to enter the souls of certain ambitious Republican statesmen who pant for a residence in the White House even as the hart panteth for the water brooks!

The dispatch continues:

To-day there is not such general adherence to this idea. Having had twenty-four hours to think over Mr. Roosevelt's resentful production, and perhaps to have obtained a tip from the proper quarter, Republican Congressmen were inclined this afternoon and this evening to the opinion that the message was intended to strengthen Secretary Taft's candidacy and that it is bound to have that or the contrary effect of injuring him greatly.

However coldly the message was received by Republicans in Congress, hundreds of people away from Washington liked it so well that they sent telegrams of congratulation to the President. These helped to dry any dampener that may have been put on Mr. Roosevelt's spirits by his failure to awaken enthusiasm among his party's legislators, and he found additional cause of gratification in the kind words poured into his ears to-day by statesmen who found that duty demanded they call at the White House.

BOMBARDMENT MAY CONTINUE.

Some of the Republicans in Congress, particularly in the House, are much concerned over a suspicion that, unless Congress undertakes to enact some of the measures suggested in the President's special message, Mr. Roosevelt will bombard the Capitol with more messages of the same character in an attempt to arouse the people and bring from them a demand that the President's suggestion be adopted. Nothing has appeared, however, to justify any belief that Mr. Roosevelt has any such intention in view, or that there is warrant for a rumor that if Congress adjourns without putting more of the Roosevelt policies into the form of law, he will call an extra session.

The Congress leaders have determined upon a legislative programme which embraces very little work. Financial legislation is probable, and there is reason to believe that the employers' liability law, recently declared unconstitutional, will be reenacted in terms that will pass the scrutiny of the Supreme Court. The President, in his special message, urged that the law be reenacted, but it did not need his urging to make Congress take notice of this measure. Beyond these special features, not much legislative work outside of the necessary appropriation bills is contemplated, and in spite of the rumors that Mr. Roosevelt will insist that his views be placed on the statute books the Congress leaders are not giving any consideration to the question of abandoning their plan for an early adjournment.

So much for the Globe-Democrat.

On the western border of Missouri is Kansas City, in which is published the Journal, the Republican organ of western Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, and eastern Nebraska. In a recent issue it contained this racy editorial paragraph, which I cheerfully commend to all concerned:

The crack of the Administration whip has drowned all other sounds in Missouri, and the deadly menace of the "big stick" has overhung every Republican politician who has an office or who hopes to get one. Postmasters, district attorneys, marshals, revenue collectors, post-office inspectors, bank examiners, railway mail clerks, porters, keepers of cuspidors, and deputies of every kind and description in the Federal service, not to mention State committeemen, county committeemen, Congressional committeemen, and other more or less distinguished outs who hope to get a slice of Federal pie when it is cut next year, have joined in the Federal, if not national, anthem, "I'm a Taft man—beat me to it if you can," or words to that effect, chorally expressed.

I submit to a candid world that that is rather rough on a President who is a great civil-service reformer—on paper. I submit, furthermore, that if any Democrat in the land had written and published that, some limber-legged cuckoo would denounce him as a slanderer, and the President himself would have promptly clapped the offender into the Ananias Club; but the Kansas City Journal is a thoroughgoing Republican organ, and is in a fine position to talk back.

In St. Louis there is published the Times, an independent daily paper, with wide circulation, owned principally by Republicans of high degree. Recently it contained this editorial:

AFTER THREE DAYS.

Practically every carefully edited newspaper of prominence in the United States has sounded a note of regret in connection with the President's message. There seems to be no dissent from the proposition that Mr. Roosevelt's utterance was intemperate and unnecessary. Even the strongly partisan Republican papers have commented severely on the language employed in the latest utterance from the White House.

There is agreement on the point that the President has injured the cause of Secretary Taft. Certain of the President's supporters have reached the hasty conclusion that Mr. Roosevelt has decided to force his own renomination; but anyone who has read his various letters and statements on the subject can not with seriousness entertain such an idea.

It would appear that Mr. Roosevelt, acting in angry haste, has impulsively voiced his sentiments. In doing so he has hurt his cause and that of Mr. Taft. He has not injured the country, a fact proved by the indifference of business and its failure to respond in any way to the tirade officially sent to Congress last Friday.

These excerpts from Missouri press are straws showing how the President's message and the President's conduct are regarded by the faithful in that magnificent Commonwealth.

February 6, seven days after the event, the Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer, a thick-and-thin Republican organ, edited with great ability, sent his paper the following illuminating dispatch:

CONGRESS LIKELY TO ADJOURN EARLY DESPITE MESSAGE—ROOSEVELT'S RECOMMENDATIONS WILL PROBABLY BE IGNORED—WILL NOT BE DRIVEN BY THE BIG STICK.

INQUIRER BUREAU, POST BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1908.

An extremely early adjournment of Congress is now the talk about the Capitol. Gossip about the House corridors and cloakrooms is that the adjournment of the session will be some time between the middle of April and May 1. This would be an unusually early date for the close of a long session of Congress, but the leaders are anxious not to remain here a day longer than necessary.

Members of Congress want to be home to get ready for elections, for one thing; and, besides, this thing of trying to legislate calmly under the shadow of the big stick is disconcerting, and leads to nervousness. Since the President's message was sent to Congress there has been a great deal of talk that the Senate and House would hasten to enact the legislation the President is urging. It does not appear likely the House and Senate Republican leaders will, to any great extent, upset the plans they made at the outset of the session. These plans comprehended the passage of the appropriation bills, with a very limited number of general bills of importance, and with most of the President's recommendations fallen by the wayside.

BIG STICK NOT EFFECTIVE.

It does not seem likely the House and Senate leaders will permit themselves to be driven by the White House and clubbed into passing legislation to which they are hostile. This does not comport with the methods of men who practically control the course of things at the Capitol. The fact that an extremely early adjournment is being talked of is the best possible indication that the leaders are not calculating seriously on going into most of the subjects the President wants legislation upon. For instance, if Congress contemplated careful legislation for Federal control of corporations or Federal supervision of the issues of railroad securities, it is certain that the session would be prolonged until at least early in June. It would take weeks to dispose of matters of this kind in both Houses. It is to be recalled, too, that the currency question has yet to be threshed out in both Houses, and that a number of weeks will be taken up with this.

The seventh column of the editorial page of the Washington Post, independent, is usually devoted to interviews with distinguished visitors to the finest capital in the world. That column is an interesting feature of an interesting paper. We all read it to see if our names are written there and to try and discover what public sentiment is, for of all places Washington is the poorest view point of the political field. Here molehills are magnified into mountains and mountains are minified into molehills. Consequently those who desire to really know what is going on in the country at large read carefully and ponder prayerfully the interviews with visitors fresh from contact with the great body of the people.

Recently Hon. John C. Houk, from Knoxville, Tenn., with whom many of us served in Congress, whose father before him served many years, was in Washington, and he unbosomed himself to a Post correspondent. In the aforementioned column, on the 7th day of February, appeared an interview with him in words and figures as follows, to wit:

John C. Houk, Republican, of Tennessee, who served the Knoxville district in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses and who has frequently been a member of the State legislature, is at the Raleigh for a few days. He is the original Roosevelt man in Tennessee, and did some important work for the President. He still supports the President, and is friendly to Secretary Taft, but last night, in talking Tennessee politics, he said it was time somebody told the War Secretary how matters stood.

"The Republican party, especially in the South, will never be worth anything unless it is built upon something besides Federal offices," said Mr. Houk. "We would to-day have a Republican State administration in Tennessee but for patronage.

"By impudent interference with the rights of others and infraction of law for many years, a cabal of Federal officeholders in Tennessee has disgraced national Republican administrations; and I believe I conservatively state the case when I say that to-day there are more violations of the civil-service laws and of the spirit of civil-service reform by Federal officeholders in the South, and certainly in Tennessee, than at any time during the past generation. Conditions are worse than under Grant's Administration, when, of course, the civil-service act of 1883, and amendment thereto, were not in existence.

"When a campaign is on, inspectors or special agents are sent to the South to intimidate officeholders. In 1896 there were 196 inspectors or special agents, whose annual compensation was $1,300,000. In 1907 there were 3,000 inspectors or special agents, drawing $9,000,000 annually.

"These agents slip down among us with the muck rake in one hand for the citizen complaining of the violation of law on the part of the officeholder and a brush full of whitewash in the other hand for the offending officeholders. I speak as the friend of the present Administration, and I believe if the President knew conditions in the South he would correct them.

"We understand in Tennessee that a high public official at Washington, who never lived in Tennessee, has for months been laying wires to drive the 150,000 Republicans in my State into submitting practically to the selection of delegates to the national convention by the Federal officeholders. We shall not submit to such dictation, and that high functionary should be dismissed from the Administration.

"If Federal officeholders in Tennessee had obeyed the law, Judge Taft would have got the vote of that State in the convention without the least trouble; but now it seems that these officeholders are certain to cause double delegations from my State."

I could fill 100 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with such Republican clippings; but to do so would be wasteful and ridiculous excess, as most of you have read scores of similar tenor. It will be observed that I have quoted none of the bitter diatribes against the President, such as have appeared in the New York Sun and certain other Republican papers. I have quoted a few Republican papers which criticise and oppose him with some approximation to moderation and which may be taken and accepted as representing Republican opinion.

Here, however, is an extract from an Administration paper—the Boston Transcript—which is such a perfect gem of literature that it deserves a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which my excellent friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] characterizes as "the greatest daily published in the wide, wide world." Recently a staff correspondent of the Transcript illumined its columns with this exquisite paragraph:

The President is not using Federal patronage in any vulgar, commercial sense, or anything of the kind. He remains the high-minded man we have always known him to be. But he is using his influence as Theodore Roosevelt, persistently and mightily, for the nomination of William H. Taft, and this same Theodore Roosevelt happens to be the President of the United States, and so at the head of the greatest army of appointive officers that exists under the light of the sun. The stronger the Rooseveltite in the Cabinet or elsewhere in the public service, the greater his enthusiasm for Taft. All along the line, from the wood choppers in Government reservations to the Cabinet ministers whose political future is staked in the Roosevelt line, present and prospective, the Roosevelt men are for Taft.

These Republican criticisms and grumbings are not mere empty words and frothy mouthings. They are being transmuted into action—action hostile to the President, meant to defeat his heart's desire of bequeathing his Presidential mantle to Mr. Secretary Taft—for every gale that sweeps from the South and North and East and West brings to our ears the clash of resounding arms among the Republican factions, and to Democratic ears it is sweeter music than any symphony that Beethoven ever produced. Three hundred contesting delegates is the estimate of the newspapers. Florida Republican factionists answer Ohio factionists; Missouri Republican factionists answer to New York factionists, and from ocean to ocean among Republican factionists it is war to the knife and the knife to the hilt. More power to their arms is my sincere and fervent prayer! As they stick and thrust and cut each other, Democrats cheer them on by impartially shouting: "Go it, husband! Go it, bear!"

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] both took a fall out of Thomas Jefferson. [Laughter.] It amuses them and does not do Thomas Jefferson any harm. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I wish to suggest to those two worthy statesmen that they read a little speech that Senator George Frisbie Hoar made about Thomas Jefferson. One sentence is, "He comes down to us with the Declaration of Independence in one hand the Louisiana Purchase in the other." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nobler eulogy no man hath, and the statesmen of the present day can not damage him by assailing his memory. The gentleman from New York gets history all mixed up about Jefferson. He said that Hamilton made this a nation and that Jefferson denounced the Constitution as a mere rope of sand. Why, bless your souls, the two favorite expressions that Alexander Hamilton always used about the Constitution of the United States were, "a mere rope of sand," and "a weak and worthless fabric." They were not Jefferson's expressions at all. As late as February 27, 1802—a little more than two years before his tragic death at Weehawken—on which bloody field James Parton says that both Burr and Hamilton fell—Hamilton said in a letter to Gouverneur Morris:

Mine is an odd destiny. Perhaps no man in the United States has sacrificed or done more for the present Constitution than myself; and, contrary to all my anticipations of its fate, as you know, from the very beginning, I am still laboring to prop the frail and worthless fabric. Yet I have the murmur of its friends no less than the curses of its foes for my reward. What can I do better than withdraw from the scene? Every day proves to me more and more that this American world was not made for me.

There you have it. "A weak and worthless fabric." "What is writ is writ," and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] shall not be permitted at this late day to make a nunc pro tunc entry for his illustrious client. Hamilton and Morris were bosom cronies. Morris was one of his most faithful friends in life and his most eloquent eulogist in death.

This letter was the honest outpouring of a sore and wounded heart to a friendly ear, and no doubt expresses Hamilton's sincere opinion of the Constitution after it had been in operation thirteen years and when almost everybody else recognized it as a glorious success.

I call particular attention to the last sentence in that extract, "Every day proves to me more and more that the American world was not made for me." There spoke the real Hamilton, without hedging and without disguise. There never was a moment in his life when he did not distrust man's capacity for self-government and did not dread "the reign of the common people." [Applause on the Democratic side.] On the other hand, Thomas Jefferson believed in the common people [applause]; loved them with all the intensity of his great heart; wrought nobly for them, and they have repaid his love in Scripture measure—heaped up, pressed down, and running over.

In the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] occurs this amazing sentence. If Isaac Disraeli, father of the brilliant Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield, had ever fixed his eyes on this sentence he would have clapped it into his Curiosities of Literature. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is a learned man. He can use the English language with accuracy when he so desires. I want you to listen to this sentence now with critical ear:

But Alexander Hamilton, perhaps at a dinner at which Mr. Jefferson was present—

At a dinner, mark you—

incorporated into the Constitution and into the laws—

Mark you, at a dinner—that the debts which the States incurred for bringing liberty and victory to the Federal arms should be assumed by the Federal Government—that the National Government should be responsible for the national defense—and thereby wrote into the Constitution and the laws—

At a dinner, mark you—

the fact that we are a nation—which wonderful sentence was received with applause on the Republican side.

Lest we forget, I once more remind you that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] thinks that Alexander Hamilton, "solitary and alone"—to use Col. Thomas Hart Benton's pleonastic phrase on a memorable occasion—amended the Constitution and laws in a most important manner at a dinner! If he could accomplish all that at a dinner, what, in Heaven's name, would he have done if he had also worked at it at breakfast and at supper? [Laughter.] But the truth is that there is not a word in the Constitution, whether it was put there at dinner or any other time, about the assumption of the State's Revolutionary debts by the Federal Government. It is a matter of statute. That is all there is to that.

Some of these days, with the consent of the House, I intend to make an entire speech here about Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson, as a duty to the living and to the dead. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For the present I will content myself with this statement as to that pair of Titans.

The conspiracy, for it is nothing less, and the chief proponent of it is Hon. Elihu Root, Secretary of State, to pose Alexander Hamilton as "the father of the Constitution," is one of the most preposterous and impudent fakes in history. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know how it will work. It is the New England school of book writers that does it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Somebody hints it and then somebody declares it, and the next you know it is clapped into the schoolbooks. That title, "the father of the Constitution," belongs of right to James Madison, the great Virginian. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These latter-day Hamiltonians are endeavoring to filch from James Madison the glory of being "the father of the Constitution," just as Americus Vespucius filched from the great Genoese navigator the glory of fixing his name on a newly discovered world. The facts of history are plain. James Madison went to the Constitutional Convention with a plan of a constitution in his pocket.

It was submitted to the Virginia delegation, with George Washington at its head. They agreed to it and presented it as "the Virginia plan." Hamilton had a plan and somebody else had a plan, and the convention rejected Hamilton's plan, they also rejected the third plan, and they adopted Madison's plan in all of its essential features, and he has been acclaimed "the father of the Constitution" until quite recently.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes more, or such time as the gentleman desires in which to complete his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the House, and I will not abuse the privilege. If the spirits of the illustrious dead take any interest in the affairs of this mundane sphere, Alexander Hamilton's spirit must be in a state of perpetual hilarity on account of the antics of his disciples to make him "the father of the Constitution," a document which he always denounced as "a mere rope of sand" and "a weak and worthless fabric."

I have never been enamored of Hamilton's political theories, but candor compels the statement that he did yeoman service with his pen in the Federalist and with his tongue in the convention of New York to have the Constitution adopted. This mighty man needs no borrowed glory to make him one of the colossal figures in our history, for time and distance have only magnified his proportions, as they have also those of his immortal antagonist, Thomas Jefferson, who overthrew and destroyed the party which Hamilton had created. They were antagonists in their lives; they are antagonists in history; antagonists even in their graves.

It is said that the test of the pudding is chewing the string. [Laughter.] The test of sincerity here as to who is more in favor of any good laws which the President has suggested in his various messages is to be found much more in vote than in word. That is the genuine test of sincerity here. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], together with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], are the real leaders on the Republican side of this House, under the general supervision of the Speaker. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

They are the ruling elders. They constitute the "big five" on the Republican side of this House. These five men, by being able to catch the Speaker's eye at any time, can force any measure through this House that they want. In thirteen years' service I have never seen the Republican machine thoroughly upset and run over in this House except on one occasion, and that was when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] broke away from the Republican majority and led that flying wedge of Republican insurgents down this aisle, when the Democrats, with the gallantry of the French at Fontenoy, stood aside and let them go through the tellers first. [Laughter.] That was a great day; but the gentleman from Minnesota is now "back on the reservation." [Laughter.] I think that that day's bolt was the performance which more than all else led him finally to the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations. [Laughter.] He is one of the "big five," and all of them, as I have said, enjoy peculiar facilities in catching the Speaker's eye. [Laughter.] When one of that "big five" arises in his place and says, "Mr. Speaker," the Speaker does not fire back at him that crushing interrogatory, "For what purpose does the gentleman rise?" [laughter] for the all-sufficient reason that he knows in advance for what purpose the gentleman rises. [Renewed laughter.]

If, in an unexpected emergency, he does not know precisely what any one of the "big five" is up to, he has sufficient confidence in his sagacity and in his fidelity to the machine to take it for granted that whatever is proposed is for the good of the Republican order. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Consequently recognition is granted immediately and ungrudgingly.

I suggest, if you gentlemen want to prove your sincerity, I will tell you exactly how to do it now in about two minutes. Let one of the "big five" arise in his place and ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a new employers' liability bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Every Democrat will gladly give his consent, and in thirty minutes by the town clock the bill will be passed, carrying gladness to the heart of every wage-earner betwixt the two oceans. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I noticed, the other day, that the gentleman's authority to speak for his party was questioned by one gentleman from New Jersey. Has the gentleman canvassed his party so thoroughly now that he knows that he is speaking for the entire party?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you how that is: A few of the boys are off the reservation, but they are coming in very rapidly, one by one, as sure as you are living. I am sorry you interrupted me in such an interesting place. [Laughter.] Let the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], one of the "big five," and the slickest one of the five at that [prolonged laughter], let him ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill limiting the Federal courts in issuing injunctions—such as the Clayton bill, for instance—and it will go through like it was greased, as far as the Democrats are concerned. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let still another of the "big five" ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill providing for jury trials in contempt cases by construction, such as the Henry bill, and, so far as we are concerned, we will give you not only consent to consider it, but every Democratic vote to pass it. [Applause.]

Let still another of the "big five" ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill providing for the publication of campaign contributions and the names of campaign contributors, such as the Rucker bill, or the Cockran bill, and we on this side will hail it with rapture and pass it with a whoop. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let the biggest of the "big five," the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], arise in his place and ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill to put wood pulp and print paper on the free list, such as a dozen of us have introduced, and no Democrat will object. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On the contrary, we will be happy to record every Democratic vote in its favor, and the publishers of the land, with one accord, will rise up and call us blessed. That's an easy and certain test of sincerity. How do you Republican statesmen like that programme?

All five of these bills can be passed in one day, provided the "big five" can induce barely twenty-eight Republicans to vote for them; for twenty-eight Republicans, with the solid Democratic vote, constitute a majority of this House; and surely there are twenty-eight righteous men in this Republican Sodom. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

My Republican brethren, you have the power and you should have the disposition to enact into law such bills as I have named. You can not shirk or shift the responsibility for you have the machinery in your hands. Adjourn without such legislation, and yours will be the condemnation.

On the morning of far-famed Trafalgar, Nelson signaled his fleet: "This day England expects every man to do his duty." When the sun set on that stupendous day the Union Jack waved in triumph over a crimson ocean, and Horatio Nelson's name was written at the very top of the scanty list of the world's great sea kings.

My Democratic brothers, a greater battle than Trafalgar is here, involving more and vaster interests, fraught with more far-reaching and more momentous consequences. In the impending conflict I summon every Democrat in all this broad land to service under the Democratic banner and for Democratic principles; principles which were enunciated by the immortal Jefferson, which were upheld by the heroic Jackson, and which are as dear to the hearts of the people to-day as they were a century ago. Fighting under that banner and for those principles we won fourteen Presidential elections out of thirty. We can win again and again upon them, until we drive the Republicans from every place of power, thereby restoring the Government to the wise, sane, wholesome, patriotic principles of the fathers—a consummation devoutly to be wished. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 11, 1908:

H. R. 558. An act to extend to the port of Chattanooga, Tenn., the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement;

H. R. 9217. An act amending sections 2533 and 2534 of Revised Statutes so as to change the name of the Fairfield collection district; and

H. R. 14011. An act amending an act approved June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes."

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL].

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, after the witty, humorous, and literary address to which we have just listened, so delightful to all of us, whether we agree with the views advanced or not, it is like unto a descent to Avernus for anyone to have the temerity to address this House upon a dry subject calculated to empty the House before he has proceeded far upon his way. Yet perhaps I am justified to a certain extent in doing this, because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has himself in the course of his address twice alluded to the subject upon which I propose to speak this afternoon. He called the attention of the committee to the remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in referring to the tariff upon wood pulp and paper, and then almost at the close of his address he brought up an illustration of how eagerly this House would vote, without dragging the slow hours along, for the immediate passage of a bill, if one of the "big five" would introduce it, which would place wood pulp upon the free list. I believe the remarks of the gentleman were that there were some twelve bills of that character now pending before this body, and that the matter is exciting more or less interest is undoubted. Yet, strange as it may appear, although this matter has, in my judgment, excited more interest and comment during the past year than any other article upon the tariff schedule, we have up to this time failed, as far as I can learn by reading the comments in the newspapers or by the addresses on this floor, to ascertain one single reason why it should be done. No facts, no data have been given. It seems to have been assumed as a self-evident proposition. Therefore, inasmuch as I myself, as trustee of an estate and a director in one of the large pulp companies of this country, have a certain personal interest in the matter, it seems to me my duty to exploit the subject.

It is well known that during the last few months the American Publishers' Association and the Editorial Association have been in Washington and have laid their grievances before the President of the United States. They demanded, as our Democratic friends are demanding, that the tariff on pulp should be removed. They expected, from intimations that they had heard, that the President would favor that proposition. Much to their astonishment, when his annual message was read before this Congress when it first convened, instead of recommending what they had demanded, he recommended something entirely different, and a measure, which I shall endeavor to show before I finish my remarks, is more drastic than the law as it now exists, because his recommendation was that the duty should be taken off wood pulp, but there should be entered into an agreement with the Dominion of Canada that there should be no export duties placed upon pulp logs by the Canadian Parliament, a proposition going much further than the existing law, as I shall proceed to show. In the last gubernatorial campaign in Massachusetts the Democratic candidate for governor formulated his own platform. That platform was made up of four planks—free hides, free coal, free wood pulp, and free timber. He said it was a referendum to the electors of Massachusetts, that they, by electing him on that platform which he himself had formulated, would demonstrate to the country that not only was Massachusetts eager for tariff revision, but that they were eager for tariff revision along the lines he had laid down. I read every speech of that candidate as it appeared in the metropolitan journals of Boston, and I assert to you honestly and squarely that I never saw one single reason advanced in any speeches which that candidate made why the duty should be removed upon wood pulp. He seemed either to assume, as everybody else who has discussed this question seems to have assumed, that it was a self-evident proposition, or else if they did look into the matter they were confronted with such insuperable objections that they did not dare advance the argument before the people.

Now, in order that this may properly be understood it is necessary that I should in a sort of academic way state how paper is made. This may seem to be a matter of supererogation, and yet you can not understand the paper business and the pulp business unless you know how paper and pulp are made. Pulp is made out of the fiber of wood. There is nothing in paper, except coloring matter, but wood. There is nothing but wood in the paper which I hold before you. This paper reduced to fiber by a mechanical process in placed in an immense tank of water, and then the fiber is taken off by a paper machine, on a cloth which revolves about rollers until it comes out a sheet, and to come out a sheet, which is absolutely indispensable, it is necessary that the fiber should be matted together, should hold together. The only wood thus far found, even under the inventive genius of the American people, whose fiber is sufficiently long and strong and of the proper color to mat together and make news paper, is spruce. You can make paper out of cottonwood and hemlock and pine. You can make it out of cornstalks, but you can not make it so that it will sell, because under the present machinery and processes by which paper is made you have got to have a long, strong, tenacious fiber, and the only wood that is known which produces that fiber is spruce wood. Now, in making news paper the sap is not taken out of the fiber. Therefore, when that fiber is matted together it has all the moisture in it. If you should take a newspaper like the Washington Post or any other paper issued in this city to-day and take your pen and ink and write upon it, you would find that the ink spreads; and that is because the sap in the fiber is still there. The result of this is, the sap being in the fiber of the news paper, there is always more or less moisture, so that you can not write on it, so that you can easily tear it apart. It seems to be rotten, but that rottenness is only apparent, it is simply the ease of separation by reason of the sap being in the fiber that you can tear it apart. Therefore, it is absolutely indispensable that you get a fiber that will hold together because the sap is in it, and the only fiber that can be found to be used among the mills of the Northern States is spruce.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is that spruce found?

Mr. TIRRELL. I am coming to that. Spruce wood is found in Maine, New Hampshire, a little in Vermont, in New York, in Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and considerable quantities in West Virginia. There is still a very large supply in the State of Maine. There is a considerable quantity in New Hampshire, but inasmuch as it is proposed at a no distant day to make a forest reservation in the northern part of New Hampshire, and as that reservation will take out 600,000 acres, there will not be spruce enough left to run the great mill at Berlin in that State without getting pulp and logs from Canada.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How large are the trees, and how long does it take them to grow?

Mr. TIRRELL. The trees that they grind up are, on an average, about 5 to 8 or 9 inches in diameter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How old is a tree of that size?

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not say, but spruce is a fairly rapid grower. I should think it would take about forty years to get a good-sized growth of spruce. Perhaps the gentleman from Maine can tell you.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think the gentleman is a little extreme, I should say between thirty and forty years; but of course that depends a good deal upon what you call the average growth—on the diameter of the tree.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. TIRRELL. Certainly.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I have heard the statement made many times as to how large a space of territory in the way of acres of ordinary spruce timber is required to issue one of the Sunday editions of the large papers like the New York American. The gentleman from Massachusetts is always accurate, and I wish he would state, if he knows, in regard to that.

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not say. I have seen the same statement that the gentleman has seen, that it took a territory of 10 or 12 acres.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does the gentleman think that is possible?

Mr. TIRRELL. I do not. I have never seen it figured out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman tell us how long it will be before we have no spruce to use at the rate that we are now cutting it?

Mr. TIRRELL. I am coming to that, and I will try to give the gentleman information on that point.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is the gentleman advised as to the relative draft upon the forests of the country for the pulp and paper industry as compared with all other timber and lumber products?

Mr. TIRRELL. About 5 per cent is used for pulp.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think the gentleman is in excess of the actual draft. The present draft of the pulp and paper industry, as compared with the total consumption—and that includes lumber, timber, firewood, fences, etc.—is only 1.78 per cent. Those are the figures given to me by the Forestry Bureau.

Mr. TIRRELL. I took my statement from the newspapers.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have taken mine directly from the Bureau of Forestry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman concludes his remarks, I wish he would explain about what is known as the "paper trust," and what the result has been in the litigation of the Federal Government against it?

Mr. TIRRELL. The gentleman refers to the General Paper Company which is located in the western part of the country along the line of the Mississippi River. I am not conversant with that matter, although I have among my papers here a list of all the companies that were involved in that trust. That trust was organized from these companies forming the General Paper Company, which did all their selling—an illegal transaction broken up by the Government. As to the particulars of that I am unable to state.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman said it was broken up by the Government. I hope it has been broken up, but my information is that there was entered a consent decree enjoining it, and that it is now disobeying it, and hence the recommendation of the President.

Mr. TIRRELL. I was speaking about the subject of spruce in New York. More than one-half of the news paper of this country is made in the State of New York, and I will say to the gentleman, in addition, that the increase in the manufacture of paper has been so wonderful, indeed marvelous, in this country since 1870 that the United States is now making more paper—almost as much paper as the rest of the civilized world.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Print paper?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes. In New York the State has prohibited the cutting of timber of any kind for twenty years over a territory covering 4,000 square miles. There are 3,588,803 acres of available spruce timber lands in New York. But the Adirondack Park reservation contains 2,807,760 acres of this, leaving 781,760 acres only for pulp supplies. Now, when we get to Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, we find there that spruce wood has become very largely denuded, and they are absolutely obliged to run their paper mills in those States by receiving their supply of paper from the Province of Quebec. They have been very wasteful, apparently, in the natural supply in their own country, but whether wasteful or not, those great mills are now dependent upon a foreign country to keep the mills going. I speak of these things in order to come to the most important, and really the only important, consideration in connection with the tariff on wood pulp. There were 2,800,000 cords of spruce wood from the United States used last year in making pulp.

There was obtained from Canada 736,000 cords, according to the official returns, but according to the estimates made in Canada, from 800,000 to 1,000,000 cords of pulp logs were exported to this country, necessary to keep our mills going; and the importance of maintaining our hold in order to secure wood to manufacture paper from was so great that paper manufacturers, than whom there are no more alert, far-sighted, and prophetic business men in the country, early saw that in order to conserve the spruce supply of the United States, not destroying small timber, but only cutting it out as it ought to be done, so that the forest would replace itself, they must have supplies from the other side of the border on which to draw, not wholly, but only partly, so that they could properly cut down the spruce on the timber lands which they own, located in the United States, to supply the necessary deficiencies from the timber exports from the Province of Quebec. The importance of the tariff, therefore, in regard to the maintenance of this great industry in our country—and there are 108 paper and pulp mills in the State of New York alone, and New York is dependent to run these mills upon the spruce which they receive from the Dominion of Canada, and will become more and more so as the years pass by—in order to maintain those mills, to keep those mills going, it was not necessary to have a little picayune tariff of 15 per cent. That does not amount to anything; that is only one-third of the average tariff rates of the Dingley bill. There is not a paper mill in the United States but what could successfully maintain its competition with the Canadian mills if that little tariff of 15 per cent was the only consideration. Our paper sells higher and is better than any paper made on the other side of the line. We get better prices for it in England and on the Continent than they can get for Canadian paper, because it is better made and of higher quality, and the paper manufacturers of the United States, if that was the only thing connected with the tariff, would come in here and request with all celerity and, as the eloquent gentleman from Missouri said, let any of these bills engineered by the "big five" go into immediate enactment.

The little joker, as the gentleman from Wisconsin said the other day about the Standard Oil tariff, the little joker to the tariff of 15 per cent, is what is needed and what has preserved this industry in our country. I commend the wisdom of those who framed the Dingley Act, who saw with prophetic vision what the future was likely to be in regard to this industry, not in raising the tariff upon pulp, which they did not do because the tariff there is the same under the Wilson law, and the tariff upon paper and pulp has been in existence ever since the organization of the Government, as appears by statement which I herewith submit for consideration:

Act of July 4, 1789, all paper, 7½ per cent.
Act of August 10, 1790, printing paper, 10 per cent.
Act of May 22, 1824, printing paper, 10 cents per pound.
Act of August 30, 1842, printing paper, 10 cents per pound.

Act of July 30, 1846, printing paper, 30 per cent ad valorem.
Act of March 3, 1863, printing paper, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Act of March 3, 1883, printing paper, sized, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Act of March 3, 1883, printing paper, unsized, 15 per cent ad valorem.
Act of October 1, 1890 (McKinley), printing paper, sized, 20 per cent ad valorem.
Act of October 1, 1890 (McKinley), printing paper, unsized, 15 per cent ad valorem.
Act of August 27, 1894 (Wilson), printing paper, sized, 15 per cent ad valorem.
Act of July 24, 1897 (Dingley), printing paper, value not over 2 cents, three-tenths cent per pound = 15 per cent = $6 per ton.
Act of July 24, 1897 (Dingley), printing paper, value not over 2½ cents, four-tenths cent per pound.

Indeed, under some tariff acts, in the early part of the last century, the tariff was 10 cents per pound.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is it now?

Mr. TIRRELL. Reduced to an ad valorem basis, which is the only way by which a person can understand it, it is 15 per cent on the price of the article; and it has never been any lower in the whole history of the country than it is to-day, at least not enough to take any account of. But they attached this provision to that tariff so that in case Canada should impose an export duty upon logs, by what is known as a "countervailing duty" our Government could impose an equal duty upon any pulp or paper if they attempted to import or sell it in this country. That, gentlemen, as I now shall endeavor to show, has been the sole salvation of the paper mills of New York, and, if continued, will be the salvation of the paper mills of the country in the years to come. In Canada, if anywhere in the world, is the inexhaustible supply. In Ontario alone the pulp area is 80,000 square miles, or approximately 51,000,000 acres, to say nothing of greater areas still in Quebec, Labrador, and the great Northwest.

Mr. BONYNGE. Is there any tariff on the spruce wood?

Mr. TIRRELL. No.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How would the export tax affect the value of the log on this side?

Mr. TIRRELL. Logs are admitted free. There is no export duty. I will now proceed and inform the gentlemen and the House what the condition is that is confronting us in regard to this great industry. And, gentlemen, right upon that point I want to give you a few figures as to the extent of it. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] told me a few minutes ago that one-third of all the capital in that great State which was invested in manufacturing enterprises was invested in the paper and pulp industry. The product of the pulp and paper mills of this country amounts to over $200,000,000. There are $300,000,000 of invested capital, and $32,000,000 yearly paid in wages.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, on that question of the cost of Canadian wood as compared with domestic wood, I submit for the consideration of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL] that the Canadian wood to-day, when it is purchased in the Canadas and imported to the United States and into the State of Maine, costs at the mill from $1 to $2 a cord more than the domestic would cost without any tariff. And within the last ten days there has been a resolution brought up in the Canadian Parliament for the establishment of an export duty on pulp wood, so that it would add $1 or $2.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is that because it is better wood?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is simply because the people in Maine are using up their domestic supply quite rapidly, and they want to preserve it, and under existing conditions they are able to pay this export price in order to save their own wood that is now growing in the forests.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it true that there are any of them so philanthropic that they will pay a dollar or two more a cord for the wood than they would for the Maine wood?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is not a question of philanthropy. About 22 per cent of the consumption of the Maine mills comes from the Canadas. They buy it and pay that extra price for the purpose of conserving their own supply.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, I was upon this point. Under our Constitution there can be no export duties imposed, and your cotton and wheat and corn go out free, but it is not so in the Dominion of Canada. Under their system of procedure and laws they can not only impose export duties, but they can really prohibit their raw material from going out of the country. I wish to show you just exactly what they are doing and how they feel upon this matter, and the danger to American industries. The largest manufacturer of paper and pulp in Canada is William Van Horne. Most of you, and I presume all of you, have heard of him. He is one of the captains of industry in Canada and one of the great men of the Dominion. He is the president of the largest pulp and paper mill in Canada. He can manufacture 52,000 tons of paper a year, and Canada only uses 27,000 tons. The surplus he is sending to England and Australia, and some of it to this country. Now, I want you to know exactly what Mr. William Van Horne has to say in regard to the policy which should be enforced as to the exportation of pulp wood to this country. He says:

Let us cut off the supply of pulp wood from the American mills. Then in six months you will find American capitalists erecting paper mills in Canada.

I am going to give you a few quotations. I have a large number of them, but I will not weary you too long by this one line of thought in connection with this matter.

W. H. Rowley, a prominent Canadian, on December 5 last, before the Canadian Manufacturing Association, said:

The imposition of a substantial export duty on pulp wood would make Canada the world's mistress in this industry.

E. N. Lewis, a member of Parliament, gave notice on the 20th day of January of this year to the Canadian Parliament, as follows:

That in the opinion of this House such an export duty should be placed on pulp wood that will induce its manufacture into paper in this country, and thus save to the labor of Canada the $6,000,000 now lost.

Last month there was also a delegation, headed by a representative of the Toronto Globe, who came to Ottawa and were lobbying in the Parliament there to have either a prohibitive or export duty placed on logs. It is currently reported that to bribe the newspapers of Canada these men, the representatives of the pulp and paper manufacturers of the Dominion, agreed to enter into a contract for a long term of years with newspaper publishers, if the press will favor this movement, at a far less price than paper is selling for at the present time.

It shows the persistent determination of the pulp and paper manufacturers of the Dominion to obtain an absolute monopoly of this business.

J. D. Holland, of the St. Jerome Paper Company and the Northern Mills Company, of Canada, is at Ottawa most of the time lobbying in this matter. F. Howard Wilson, of the St. Jerome Paper Company, favors a prohibitive duty on pulp wood to secure the establishment of American mills in Canada. Adelard Turgeon, minister of lands and forests in Canada, says:

It would be a great boon for the public domain if the federal government put an export duty on pulp wood.

A. G. Eagin, who buys pulp wood for export, says:

If Canadians would go into the pulp and paper business on a large scale, the situation would be altered.

If they did, it would be bad for the Americans. It would mean that Canada would eventually control all the trade in pulp wood, pulp, and paper. James Beveridge, of the Mirianinchi Pulp and Paper Company, says he would favor a prohibitive duty if he could be assurred it would not result in a tariff war. Francis J. Conway, the surveyor-general of New Brunswick, expresses the same opinion. W. H. Rowley, of the E. B. Eddy Company, says:

What is the sense of sending our wood to build up a foreign country and furnish it with weapons to fight Canada in the commercial world? Canada for the Canadians means something.

Now, I am not going to take up your time by further quotations. I have only given a sufficient number, it seems to me, to demonstrate to the reasonable satisfaction of the gentlemen who are present here that there is a systematic, persistent, determined effort being made by Canadians and by the leading newspapers of the Dominion—by almost every person interested in the business—to either have Canada prohibit the exportation of pulp logs or else place such a duty upon the exportation thereof as to make it impossible for Americans to continue the manufacture on either side of the line. In order to meet such a condition as that and not have this great industry destroyed, there are only one or two things which stare them in the face. The principal thing is that they are fearful that if they impose an export duty on pulp logs, or prohibit them, we will levy a retaliatory or countervailing duty which will operate as disastrously against them as the prohibition of the exportation of pulp logs would operate against us.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell me why American manufacturers or American capital goes over into Canada to manufacture? Why do they not stay at home?

Mr. TIRRELL. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that they do not. They are not going to Canada to manufacture pulp paper. It is not necessary at present, and they do not go there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood you to say that American capitalists go there to engage in the manufacture of paper?

Mr. TIRRELL. You misunderstood me entirely. I said that if logs were prohibited from entering this country or such an export duty was placed upon them that they could not be used here, then the American manufacturers ultimately would have to go to Canada to carry on business there, because there would be no raw material to work on here—not an amount to keep these mills going. I do not mean but what there would be some manufacturing in Maine and very little in the West, but not enough to meet the demands, and it would amount to nothing in the long run.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell me what proportion of the pulp wood is imported from Canada?

Mr. TIRRELL. About one-third at the present time.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. How much capital is there invested in this business in the United States?

Mr. TIRRELL. I understood the gentleman from Maine to say that in his State alone there was about $40,000,000 invested.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. About how many people are there engaged in the manufacture of the pulp?

Mr. TIRRELL. Tens of thousands, but I could not tell you. The amount of wages alone paid for pulp and wood amounted to $32,000,000, and when you also add the labor which is involved in getting out the pulp wood, it will amount to $40,000,000, and perhaps more than that.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. It has been charged through the press of the country that the manufacture of paper was largely in the hands of a trust, and for that reason the general public had been held up, and the price of paper has increased therefrom to all the people throughout the United States. I would be glad to know what the gentleman has to say in answer to this charge.

Mr. TIRRELL. I am coming to that, and I think I may as well take that up now.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Another question, which the gentleman can answer in the same connection. There is no prohibition placed, or no export duty on manufactured paper in Canada; or is it only on pulp wood?

Mr. TIRRELL. The proposition now is to have an export duty on pulp wood. They do not want us to have free pulp; and their avowed purpose is to force American capital into Canada to make paper and pulp there, and discontinue as far as possible its manufacture here.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. But nothing on the manufacturers' product?

Mr. TIRRELL. Of course not; they want our market, and if they can stop our manufacturing they can send their pulp over here for us to buy, if we want to keep our paper mills going.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Does not the one offset the other? When they undertake to put their price up, will not that enable our people to manufacture here and get into the market in competition?

Mr. TIRRELL. The trouble is there is not raw material here sufficient to keep the mills going.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Is not that also a further reason why we should conserve our own timber for other purposes?

Mr. TIRRELL. We certainly should, and I want to say to the gentleman that the pulp and paper companies of this country own over 12,000 square miles of timber land in Canada. They have provided for the future. Not only that, but they have thousands of square miles in New Brunswick.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Would this prohibitive export duty operate against the property that these gentlemen now own in Canada?

Mr. TIRRELL. Why, certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. They would have no right to export their own property?

Mr. TIRRELL. Certainly not, when the control of the ownership is in another country. I have not time to go into all these matters, but the situation in Canada is that there are immense tracts of Crown land. There are 104,000,000 acres of timber land in Canada, and a very large portion of this is what is known as Crown land. Now, these Crown lands are leased, and the leases expire within about two years. It is doubtful if any action will be taken until those leases expire, so far as the Crown lands are concerned, because those who have leased them did so under the implied agreement that they could sell the timber on them under the laws as they then existed.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. And remove the timber at their pleasure?

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, this is too large a subject for me to cover in the time which I have under my control, and I do not desire to be diverted further from my argument. I want to take up this matter of the paper tariff and some other things connected with the subject which I think are of very great importance.

I was very much surprised to listen to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] the other day in reference to a "vicious paper trust." I asked him what company he had reference to, and he told me it was the International Paper Company. The territory, so far as the sale of paper is concerned, is practically divided, east of the Mississippi River, into two sections. There is a General Paper Company that controls the western part, and then there is the International Paper Company and independent companies that control the eastern part. It is true there is more or less selling back and forth, the eastern companies selling some in the West and the western companies selling some in the East, but not very much. Some draw the inference from that fact that there is an agreement between the two sections of country. As a matter of fact, if gentlemen are conversant with business in the northern part of the country, they must know that wood pulp and paper are very heavy articles to transport, and the freight rates are enormous. Pulp is sold to be delivered, and when you add to the price of the paper the cost of transportation, and take it a thousand miles away, you have increased the price so much that the East can not compete with the West and the West can not compete with the East.

It is just the same as it is in regard to all other lines of business where the transportation charges are heavy. Why, gentlemen, ten years ago a gentleman who was one of the leading boot and shoe jobbers in the city of Boston—I may as well tell you his name; he was my own brother—had been very successful and accumulated a competence in that business. He came to me, and he said, "Charles, I am going out of this business." He was in the western boot and shoe jobbing business, and one of the largest houses in the city of Boston. I said to him, "Why, you surprise me." He said: "Yes; I have figured this thing as carefully as I could, have kept awake nights over it, and I can not figure it out in any other way but that I must lose $10,000 a year as long as I keep in this business. We can not compete with the western jobber in Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and other large western cities." He went out of business, and he saved his fortune.

He was the first one to do it. There were nineteen others in that business, with great warehouses and stores, in the city of Boston ten years ago, and I want to assure you, gentlemen, on my honor, for I know it as a fact, that every one of those western boot and shoe jobbing houses have either failed or gone out of business since that time because they could not compete with the cost of transportation and additional expenses with the western jobber.

That is all the answer I have got to make to that portion of the gentleman's address. He spoke about a vicious paper and pulp trust here in the East, and I have had the curiosity to look that matter up and propose to submit to you a few observations.

If there is a trust, and I understand a trust in this connection means a combination of individuals, companies, or corporations so organized into one that it is able to control the product, and is such a monopoly that it can raise at will the price. If there is any such monopoly in the paper and pulp business, or in any other business, I trust that all the laws enacted on the statute book and all the power of the Government will be exerted to break up that trust. I am opposed to successful wrongdoing in business or even in the private operations of the individual anywhere and everywhere.

If there is such a trust as that which is controlling the product and can raise the price of the output at will, the gentleman is correct, and the power of Congress, if necessary, should be evoked. I had the curiosity to look into this matter to determine that question, and I have sent for and have in my hand the last annual report of the International Paper Company of New York. I find in their statement of earnings, after paying the interest on their bonds and 6 per cent on the preferred stock, they have only a surplus, in a corporation capitalized at over $50,000,000, of $279,214.48.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. What are the amounts of their stock and bonds; what is the capitalization?

Mr. TIRRELL. The capitalization of the company is, of preferred stock, twenty-two million and some odd dollars; common stock, $17,000,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is that an overcapitalization, or is it a fair representation of the property that they have got?

Mr. TIRRELL. It would take me fifteen minutes to answer that question. I am perfectly familiar with it. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will extend my time, I will stand here and answer it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD the details of the organization of the International Paper Company?

Mr. TIRRELL. I want to say that if the International Paper Company made as good a bargain when it organized its companies in 1898, making it out of twenty-four constituent companies, as they did out of one plant that I was trustee of, a large plant in Maine, they are the shrewdest and worthiest and best investors the world has ever known. As to the organization of the company the gentleman will see it would require an investigation for which now time and opportunity are not afforded.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, the gentleman is familiar with the facts; let me ask him one more question.

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not permit it, much as I would desire to do so. I have so much to cover I must not be switched off.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is on that very point as to the organization of the International Paper Company.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will take the pains to answer my question in the RECORD when he prints his speech. I want to know if his company is overcapitalized?

Mr. TIRRELL. Do not call it my company. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, the company the gentleman is speaking about.

Mr. TIRRELL. I want to say here now that it would be impossible to duplicate the plant of the International Paper Company for any such sum of money, in my judgment, as is represented by their capitalization, but it is another question whether there was not originally what you might call overcapitalization in bonuses and in stock when it was organized. I want to say to the gentleman that outside of the first year, when they had a sort of half monopoly—as I will explain directly—they have never paid one dollar on the common stock.

Mr. HARDWICK. How much on the preferred stock?

Mr. TIRRELL. They never have paid over 6 per cent, and not only that, but I should add also that its preferred stock for years has not sold up to 90 per cent on the dollar, and only once at about that price. The average price I should estimate at about 71 per cent on the dollar. During the panic it sold as low as 54 per cent. It is now about 60 per cent. If it is a trust, it does not present any allurement to the speculative mind; rather, I should infer, it was having rather a hard time to keep up with the procession.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much of the trade of the country does it control? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. TIRRELL. I must get on in a regular way, but I think I will answer all of these questions.

Mr. GARNER. Is there any other paper concerned in selling paper in the East?

Mr. TIRRELL. I will tell you all about it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman please tell how much of the trade that concern controls? I don't care how much water it has in it.

Mr. TIRRELL. I will answer that question now. The trade controlled by the International Paper Company, of New York, the first year of their existence, in 1898–99, was 60 per cent of the newspapers of this country; but mills have so multiplied and competition has been so fierce and the plants have been so extended that that percentage has gone down and down and down until now they are manufacturing only 40 per cent of the paper of the whole country and only 50 per cent of the news paper manufactured east of the Mississippi.

Mr. DRISCOLL. What proportion do they control in New York State, for instance?

Mr. TIRRELL. I must get on with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TIRRELL. Open up some new subject and I will try to answer the questions.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I think that is pertinent to this question.

Mr. TIRRELL. I will speak of that.

Mr. SMITH of California. I would like to propose a question, and the gentleman may answer it now or in the course of his remarks later——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIRRELL. Where is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]? I want to know first whether I will get my time extended. I have only fifteen minutes left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TIRRELL. Who ever heard of a monopoly that never could pay 1 per cent on more than half of its stock, only 6 per cent on its preferred stock, sell only 40 per cent of news paper, and have surplus earnings in excess of all expenditures, including dividends, of $279,214.48 only in one year on a capitalization of over $50,000,000? Why, it is perfectly ridiculous, and answers itself. Then, again, to show that there is no monopoly in the paper business, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are eighteen independent paper and pulp mills of large size making news paper in the eastern part of this country, in New York, Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts. I herewith give a list of them, with their daily capacity:

	Tons.
NEW YORK.
St. Regis Paper Company	130
Taggart's Paper Company	30
French, Pruyn & Co.	60
Gould Paper Company	35
Malone Paper Company	25
Cliff Paper Company	40
Pette Bone Cataract Paper Company	30
High Falls Paper Company	30
Remington, Martin Company	60
Norwood Paper Company	30
Raymondville Paper Company	70
Scroon River Pulp and Paper Company	20
NEW HAMPSHIRE.
Berlin Mills Company	215
MAINE.
Great Northern Paper Company	450
Bowdoin Paper Manufacturing Company	35
Pejepscot Paper Company	75
Lisbon Falls Paper Company	50
St. Croix Paper Company	80
Total	1,465

These are all large competitors of the International Paper Company.

They are in direct competition with the International Paper Company. Competition is of the fiercest character. It is so fierce that I want to assure you gentlemen that there are only a few paper companies that have made any profit so that they have been able to declare any dividends during the last ten years. At times they have sold—and often in the past—paper for less than it cost to keep the mills going on account of the overproduction of paper in this country. I can give some illustrations that have come under my own observation. The greatest metropolitan journal in Boston is undoubtedly the Boston Globe. Their Sunday circulation is 311,000 copies, and they usually have an edition of forty to sixty pages. Their daily edition is in the same proportion. I go by their place of business week days when in Boston, because in that city is my place of business. I notice at their printing establishment that every day about half past 4 their paper arrives. Prior to about a year ago the International Paper Company had their label on the paper, but about a year ago the label on the paper was the St. Croix Paper Company, of Maine, an independent paper company that manufactures about 80 tons a day. The next most prosperous journal—in fact, the one, it is said, that makes the most money in Boston—is the Boston Transcript. Unless they have changed within the last year or two they have bought of independent paper companies. I have not inquired as to the other papers there. Go to the city of New York—the gentleman has referred to New York—and inquire about the New York World, the Times, or the Herald, and other journals, and you will find that they have more or less bought of these independent companies. The truth of the matter is that about the 1st of January, when the paper contracts are made in this country, the figures are sent in and contracts for the coming year made. The Great Northern Paper Company, of Maine, manufactures about 500 tons of paper a day. The Berlin Company, of New Hampshire, manufactures about 300 tons a day. All of these companies want to sell their products, and they make immense quantities of it. There are 1,300 tons of news paper made every day by these independent companies, as against about 1,000 tons made by the International. The International Company must meet them in competition, and the contracts are changing all the time, and they have to figure down to the very lowest possible amount.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TIRRELL. No; I can not answer any question just now. They have to figure down to the very lowest possible margin. I wrote to the International Paper Company. I wanted to see what they would say about these profits. I will read you a portion of the letter I received in reply. I think all of this will be interesting, as coming from headquarters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I ask what headquarters?

Mr. TIRRELL. The International Paper Company.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. TIRRELL. No; I will not.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is a newspaper man.

Mr. TIRRELL (reading)—

Leaving out other lines than the manufacture of news paper, I can say that with possibly two or three brief periods of a few months in my experience of twenty-two years I have never known news manufacture, as a whole, to show more than a meager return upon the capital invested. There have been mills here and there which have made handsome profits, but, on the whole, this branch of the industry has been subject to unbridled competition, which has been at times so fierce as to drive many mills to the wall and really threaten ruin to all.

The tremendous growth of the business has to a large extent been due to an effort on the part of individual manufacturers to save themselves by manufacturing on a larger scale. If only one manufacturer resorted to this expedient it might be all right, but when the majority do it it simply aggravates the trouble and leads to overproduction. This has been an almost chronic condition—viz, overproduction—so that in the effort to sell prices have been cut and the margin of profit practically wiped out.

Newspapers have taken advantage of the low prices to put more and more paper into their issues, and have become so spread out in this way, and so used to the price continually going down, that when the price halts or has an upward tendency they cry out that it is due to a monopoly.

Any industry ought to be entitled to a fair profit on the capital invested in it as a whole, as plants vary in efficiency according to their age and location. This means that mills representing average efficiency should make a fair return. It may be said of the International Paper Company that at the time of its formation it at least represented average efficiency, if not more than that, and the expenditure of money since has unquestionably made our plants, as a whole, better than the average plant engaged in the same line of manufacture.

You are perfectly safe in asserting that the news paper manufacturing industry is, and has been for years, run upon a most slender margin of profit. The very latest and best mills have scarcely been able to earn more than bare interest on their investment.

This brings me to the consideration of another matter suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] namely, that this alleged trust of paper companies should be smashed to pieces, because it had raised the price of paper to an extortionate degree. Well, if that is so, of course no one could come to anything but the same conclusion. I desire, however, to show you that there is no great industry in this country where, in proportion to the rise of prices in other commodities, there has been so small advance made as by the pulp-paper makers of the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us how many companies are in this International Paper Company?

Mr. TIRRELL. Twenty-four.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman tell me whether a newspaper publisher can not get a rate from any of these so-called "independent" companies of the country?

Mr. TIRRELL. That statement has been absolutely denied time and time again——

Mr. GLASS. Now, I am a newspaper publisher and I assert here you can not get a rate from an independent company.

Mr. TIRRELL. I know the gentleman is entirely mistaken in his position, I do not care whether he publishes a paper or not.

Mr. GLASS. I publish two, and I avow here I can not get a quotation from a so-called "independent" mill in this country.

Mr. TIRRELL. I decline any further to yield to discuss the question. Now, I want to say that this matter was called to the attention of the committee the other day by the gentleman from New York, but he did not call attention to the significance of the figures themselves. I find them appearing in his speech, and I desire, therefore, simply to refer to them to illustrate the point I am now endeavoring to make. In the first place, I wish to say that newspapers are a great deal cheaper now than before 1893.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have ten minutes additional, so as to enable him to answer some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the time is in control of the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much more time would the gentleman desire?

Mr. TIRRELL. About fifteen minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I must confess I can not yield any time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yielded to the gentleman two and a half hours to-day.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But I have promised all of that time away.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman fifteen minutes additional time.

Mr. TIRRELL. Now, I want to call your attention to the quotations on paper from time to time. Remember, gentlemen, that during all this period prices have been rising; then I propose to give you the figures as to the additional cost of pulp and paper; then I propose to show that the rise in the cost of manufacturing pulp and paper has more than doubled, and in many cases triple the rise in the price of paper itself. You will notice that practically the price of paper has remained the same for the past ten years prior to the last year. That appears from these quotations. In 1892 it was $3 per hundred pounds; in 1893, $3 per hundred; in 1894 and 1895, $3 per hundred; in 1896, $2.50 per hundred; in 1900, $2.50 per hundred; in 1901 it fell to $2.40 per hundred, and prices and everything else rising all the time. In 1902 it was $2.25 per hundred; in 1903, $2.50; in 1904 it fell again to $2.40; in 1905 it fell again to $2.30; in 1906 it fell to $1.90; in 1907, $2; and in 1908 selling for $2.50. In other words, if we take as a fair average the price of paper at $2 during this period—it will not vary much from that—and then you put 50 cents on that, the present price, you have a raise of 25 per cent, have you not, on the price of paper during the last ten years, during this prosperous period?

What has it cost the pulp and paper makers during this time, and how have prices risen on them; and I ask you as fair-minded men whether they are not only justified in making this raise, but whether they have not been the closest figurers for the interest of the public that you ever heard of among the manufacturers of this country?

In the first place, as to the rise in wages. I sent to the president of the mill in which I am interested and asked him to write me in regard to that matter, and he answered as follows. This mill, you should understand, makes book paper, but the same general conditions are applicable:

First. The price of pulp wood since I have been connected with this company has increased from $4.75 to $7.50 per cord piled in our yards. The cause of this rise has been from an extra charge for stumpage on the part of timber owners and the largely increased cost in labor, especially that class of labor required in driving down our river.

Second. The increase in labor cost at our mill and in our yards has been about 40 per cent (common laborers, from $1.15 to $1.65 per day).

Third. The price of soda fiber is lower now than it was for many years, up to the "panic of '93," when it declined in price, until it finally was sold as low as $1.80 per 100 pounds, delivered at our customers' mills. The present price so delivered is $2.40 per 100 pounds, or an increase of a little over 30 per cent from the lowest point reached during the hard times of 1893 to 1897.

And the same must be true of all paper mills, because they are all connected in these matters, and one must charge as much as the other as a rule. I wish to add here another extract from this letter, not directly applicable to what we are discussing, but collaterally of great importance:

While the sale of pulp for export has increased largely in the last five years (the amount before that period being very small indeed), yet practically no sales are made for shipment abroad until after the home market is fully supplied. These sales dispose of the surplus only, which accumulates because there is no other way to keep down the cost to a reasonable point, without running the mills night and day every working day in the year. This reduces the cost of soda fiber to the domestic customer as well as to the foreign buyer, and it is also a fact that the price at which soda fiber is sold in this country for export makes it cost the foreign mill owner much more than it does the owner of our domestic mills.

After sales are fairly well established in any foreign port, a reasonable profit is made by the American manufacturer; and to-day, so far as soda fiber is concerned (I can not answer for sulphite), we consider our foreign sales the best part of our business.

I want you to bear these things in mind. There is an increase in labor cost between 30 and 40 per cent, which is one-third of all that is paid out in the mill itself, and two-thirds, if you reckon all the labor that goes into paper, going back to the forest where the timber is cut.

What else have they done for the wage-earners in these pulp and paper mills? They have not only increased their wages during this period 40 per cent, but they have cut down the hours of labor 8 per cent more. That is not all. In 1906, a little over a year ago, the pulp and paper mills of this country got together and said that they would adopt a three-tour shift. Paper mills, you understand, must run day and night. They can not be idle a moment, because only by so running can you cut down the manufactured cost and sell the article for what it is selling to-day. They said, "We will put on three shifts of men instead of two." They formerly worked them twelve hours a day. They now work them eight hours a day in the paper mills of this country. If you figure that up you will find the labor cost has thereby been increased 62½ per cent more. In other words, you have got, adding on the increase that they have actually made, without reckoning the decrease in the hours of labor (8 per cent), and taking the whole thing together, an increase in labor—that is, in the labor cost to the manufacturer—of over 75 per cent.

Mr. SABATH. How do you figure that?

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not stop to do it.

Mr. GLASS. Who is paying that?

Mr. TIRRELL. I decline to yield. The gentleman will have my speech in the RECORD, and he will have the privilege of studying it and writing over the country for information.

Mr. GLASS. I have all the information I want, but the gentleman will not let me ventilate it.

Mr. TIRRELL. I have spoken about the labor in pulp and paper mills, but a more important consideration than that is the price of wood. When I first became familiar with the business you could buy all the spruce wood you wanted for $4.50 a cord. It now costs, the wood cut in the United States, $7.50 a cord and upward, and that price has increased since 1893. Therefore you have in the cost of the raw material itself an increase of from 60 to 70 per cent. It is almost double, and in some of the New York mills it is double. I would like to ask any fair-minded gentleman if you are going to increase the labor cost in mills to the manufacturer, where one-third of all that goes into that mill is labor, 75 per cent; if you are going to increase the cost of the raw material, as it has been increased in this country during this period of time to almost double—on a most conservative basis 75 per cent—and also take into consideration that everything else connected with a paper mill has had the same increase in cost that all other manufacturing establishments have had; then I want you mathematicians to sit down and figure up the labor cost, the wood cost, and the additional cost which is put into manufacturing paper in our pulp and paper mills, and as honest and fair-minded men say whether or not it has not more than doubled up the cost to the pulp and paper manufacturer, while the cost of his paper, which has been selling under the fierce competition of this country, has only increased 25 per cent from the lowest average price.

Mr. BURLESON. They want to give you cheaper wood.

Mr. BONYNGE. The wood comes in free now.

Mr. TIRRELL. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have given all the facts which I desire, unless some time is granted, and I can answer questions of gentlemen on the floor.

The sum and substance and gist of the whole matter is this: Our pulp and paper manufacturers are manufacturing at the lowest possible price consistent with existence and a meager profit. They are selling in open competition with the markets of the United States, a competition as fierce as exists in any interest in this country. They are manufacturing better paper than is made anywhere else in the civilized world, and they can continue to furnish paper at less cost and beat the world in doing it, provided they are protected as they have been protected by the Congress of the United States in all the years of its history from the beginning of the Government, not by the imposition of a trivial tariff of 15 per cent, which in itself does not amount to anything, but in the retaliatory or countervailing duty attached to the paper or pulp schedules or some other commodity to protect this industry in our country and prevent cutting off the importation free of the raw material.

If there are gentlemen on this floor who wish to see that industry wiped out, who wish to throw out of employment tens of thousands of American wage-earners and have them walking and moaning on the streets; if they wish to see the smoke and fires extinguished in the 108 mills now in the State of New York and the mills of the West and the industry hampered so that it no longer becomes a factor in the commercial development of the country, then it is only necessary to take the ground which has been assumed by some gentlemen upon the other side, without, I think, regard to facts or evidence to pass these bills to wipe out the tariff on pulp and paper and give to Canada the power to pass prohibitive export laws and close the mills of the United States. I, for one, believe protection to this gigantic and important industry is as necessary as to sow the great prairies of the West with wheat. And I can not see, from my investigation, any other conclusion than when this matter comes up in future Congresses for investigation and determination, the important question will be not of tariff on the articles, but its protection on the lines that I have indicated. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I now yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, in my efforts to entertain my friends on the other side of the House this afternoon, I want to take as my next text a little bill of four or five lines, which I have introduced, and which is pending now before the Ways and Means Committee. I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16862) to place petroleum, crude or refined, and the products of petroleum, crude or refined, on the free list.

Be it enacted, etc., That petroleum, crude or refined, and the products of petroleum, crude or refined, of whatever kind or wherever produced, when imported into the United States shall be exempt from duty.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I propose to vary this afternoon the usual order of things. I am not going to attack the Standard Oil. The popular thing at the present time is to make bitter attacks on the Standard Oil, when you can not think of anything else to do. When in doubt, make a speech against the Standard Oil or send some vitriolic message down from the White House against that corporation.

I hold here in my hand the President's message of January 31, 1908. It makes a little pamphlet of eighty-one pages; two-thirds of it at least is taken up with an attack on the Standard Oil. The most of the message and the best portion of it is contained in the appendix, which was not written by the President at all. His secretaries, with remarkable industry, have gone through all the leading metropolitan papers and other papers also and have succeeded in finding all the articles that in any way criticised the judge who assessed a fine recently against the Standard Oil, and all those articles are incorporated here in this message. The effort made by the President is to prove that he is engaged in a most terrific warfare on the Standard Oil, and that the metropolitan press is against him and is criticising the judge who made that decision. My experience is that the people are not finding much fault with the $29,000,000 fine recently assessed against the Standard Oil Company, and the President will be unable, even in a message as long as this, to create the impression that there is much of a fight on at the present time between the Administration and the Standard Oil Company. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As a matter of fact the Standard Oil has not paid the fine of $29,000,000 recently assessed against it, and there has been no effort made to collect it. Like the revision of the tariff, the collection of the fine has been postponed until after the election. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

When the elections are held the Republican leaders hope, and the Standard Oil managers hope, that the revision of the tariff and the collection of the fine will both be in the hands of the friends of the protective tariff, and in the hands of the friends of Standard Oil. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What we need from the White House at the present time is less attention to the creation of a large Ananias Club and more suggestions of real value. The ear-splitting detonations from the White House for the last two or three years do not seem to have had much effect. The projectiles fired from that quarter are not of the armor-piercing variety. The trusts are all doing business at the present time at the old stand. Not one of them has quit. No prosecutions are being started. The condition of the trust-busting industry is similar to the condition the friends of ship subsidies would have us believe our shipping industry is in. They say that the keel of no ship is being laid at the present time in an American shipyard. It is equally true that the foundations for no trust-busting suits are being laid at the present time in the Department of Justice.

I started over a year ago in the trust-busting business myself. I spent two or three months collecting evidence against the watch trust. I wore out two pairs of shoes making trips from my hotel to the Department of Justice. I called the attention of the Department of Justice to certain facts. I produced the names and addresses of witnesses. I produced the evidence. I went so far as to prepare a brief as to the law. I submitted it all, but the prosecution of the watch trust, like the revision of the tariff and the collection of the twenty-nine million dollar fine, have all been postponed beyond the election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I am not going to abuse the Standard Oil, neither am I going to abuse my friends on the other side of this House. I want to talk this afternoon simply about the romance of oil, and incidentally the connection of the Republican party therewith.

Oil is produced in only a few places in the world. They produce some oil in Japan. They have produced it there from remote antiquity. They produce some oil in Roumania. They have produced it there for over a thousand years. They produce some oil in Austria-Hungary. They produce oil in small quantities in the Dutch East Indies, and they produce oil in the United States. But the great oil fields of the world are the Russian oil fields. The other fields, except those within the boundaries of the United States, do not amount to much and do not produce any considerable amount of the world's supply.

The Russian fields are the oldest, but until recently, and about the year 1896, they were not taken seriously. These fields were known in the days of Alexander the Great, and for over a thousand years oil was transported from the valleys of the Caucasus in buckets and tubs on mules and camels down the long desert trade routes to light the palaces and harems of oriental potentates. Some of the ancient cities around the Mediterranean were lighted with oil transported in this primitive way from the oil fields of Russia. The Russian oil field was known to oriental peoples for a thousand years as "the place of the eternal fires." The fire worshipers came there from far-away India. Their temples are still standing. Only twenty-five years ago the last of the Parsee priests, who presided in the temples of the fire worshipers, disappeared from that locality. But oil transported in buckets on mules and camels, Parsee priests, ancient temples, and fire worshipers did not offer much competition for the Standard Oil, and did not attract much attention from that corporation to the Russian field.

But about the year 1896 the world commenced to find out about the Russian oil fields. For two thousand years that section, where the East and the West meet, had been deluged in blood. It was not an attractive field for the investment of capital. Geologists said that oil could only be found there at a comparatively shallow level—not deeper than 700 feet. But in the early nineties an English company, operating in a fertile valley of the Caucasus with modern drilling machines, penetrated the rocks to a depth of 1,500 feet, and the result was a great, gushing fountain of oil. They continued drilling in other directions and in other valleys, and everywhere there were produced great, gushing fountains of oil. There were 400 oil wells in operation in 1891, and in 1892 there were 900 wells in operation. Now there are over 2,000 wells in operation. But in 1892, when the Standard Oil was about to seriously consider the Russian fields, an outbreak of cholera occurred there and drove the workers away. Three years later, in 1895, they commenced slowly to come back and to go to work again, and the Russian Government commenced to build a railroad through the mountain ranges into the valleys of the Caucasus.

In 1896 they completed their pipe lines to the sea. At that time it was known in England and Germany that the great oil fields of the world were the Russian fields. The thing that frightened the Standard Oil Company the most was the fact that in the early part of 1896 fifteen or twenty modest-looking Russian gentlemen came to this country and, on foot, commenced to travel along the pipe lines of the Standard Oil Company, examining their pumping stations, getting from them ideas as to how the oil business ought to be conducted. The Standard Oil Company commenced to realize early in the year 1896 that if it was to retain its supremacy in the oil markets of the world it must protect itself at home from possible importations from the Russian fields. Like all great trusts which have become oppressive in their character, when threatened with real competition they rushed to the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the Republican party opened wide its arms and took this odorous trust to its bosom.

At this time the Standard Oil had entered upon its world-conquering career. Its pipe lines extending across mountain ranges had reached the sea. Great iron tank ships owned by the Standard Oil were plowing the ocean highways of the world, carrying its products to all quarters of the globe. It was in control of the home markets, and it had commenced to reach out for the markets of the world. In order to be successful in its foreign career it was absolutely necessary to keep out competition at home; therefore it applied to the Republican party. The real crisis in the history of the Standard Oil occurred in 1896; it was safely passed when the Republicans carried the elections. They kept their contract and enacted the Dingley law. The Standard Oil, the old-line insurance companies, and their allied interests bought you with sixteen million dollars, and you delivered the goods.

In 1897 and in 1898 the Trans-Caucasian pipe line broke down, and for two or three years the exportation of oil from the Russian fields fell off to a marked degree. The Standard Oil seized this opportunity to more firmly intrench itself in foreign countries.

Then followed the labor troubles in the Baku fields, and finally that great region was again drenched in the blood of contending factions; again different races and different religions clashed in that part of the world as they have been clashing there for a thousand years, and British and German capital fled from that region. Oil derricks were destroyed, and refineries were razed to the ground. But a new era has within the last twelve months opened up for the Russian fields. The workers are returning, the iron hand of Russian discipline has fallen heavily in that quarter, and the Russian Government agrees to maintain order there. German and English capital, at the invitation of the Government, is flowing back into that section. The Russian oil fields are again becoming important as a source of supply. The time has come, if you really want to furnish competition for the Standard Oil trust, to pass the bill I have introduced, strike out this proviso, and let the oil from Russia come in. You do not have the courage to do it—you dare not do it. The other protected industries do not love the Standard Oil, but every man who enjoys the benefit of protection is willing to be sheared himself if he may have the delightful privilege of shearing everyone else. You are obliged to maintain the Dingley tariff intact—every comma and every period in it. You dare not do that which the people almost universally demand. You are owned now, as you always have been and always will be, by great corporations and the criminal trusts.

In 1896 there was a national campaign in progress. An honest man, backed by an honest party, was making a fight for a larger circulating medium and was making the old fight for the rights of the people. It became necessary to defeat him. You made the fight for the Standard Oil and the old-line insurance companies. You took the $16,000,000 they gave you, debauched the electorate and won, and you kept your word.

When the Dingley law was framed you took care of the Standard Oil. You provided that for all time, or as long as the Dingley law remained on the statute book, Standard Oil should be protected from all competition from the Russian fields.

Section 626 of the tariff act of 1897 places upon the free list at least fifty-six kinds of oil, and I do not know how many more. It places on the free list all spermaceti and all other fish oils of the American fisheries. If I knew how many fish oils there were I would know exactly how many oils are placed on the free list by the Dingley law. There are at least fifty-six, and to that number is to be added the number of fish oils manufactured. Orange oil is placed on the free list; olive oil is placed on the free list. Notwithstanding your alleged anxiety to protect the shipping industry from foreign competition, you placed upon the free list spermaceti, whale, and all other fish oils; and the man who goes out to sea on an expedition to bring back to this country the material out of which to make these kinds of oils, goes out knowing that the Republican party is not protecting him at all. Finally, and last of all in this list, you put on the free list petroleum, crude or refined, and then add to it this proviso, which applies not to the other oils, but only to petroleum, crude or refined, or its products:

Provided, That if there be imported into the United States crude petroleum, or the products of crude petroleum produced in any country which imposes a duty on petroleum or its products exported from the United States, there shall in such case be levied, paid, and collected a duty upon said crude petroleum or its products so imported equal to the duty imposed by such country.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take it from the examination the gentleman has made into the oil industry of the country that he has extended his inquiries into the protection the Democratic party gave to the Standard Oil Company in the Wilson bill.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will read——

Mr. RAINEY. I object to the gentleman's reading; I can read it if I want to. I will come to that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is exactly the same language that the gentleman read from the Dingley law.

Mr. RAINEY. Is it? I will let the gentleman read it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Section 5 of the Wilson law says:

Provided, That if there be imported into the United States crude petroleum, or the products of crude petroleum produced in any country which imposes a duty on petroleum or its products exported from the United States, there shall be levied, paid, and collected on said crude petroleum or its products so imported 40 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, a very different thing from the Dingley Act. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not the same thing at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is different in that it imposes a higher duty.

Mr. RAINEY. It is not the same thing at all, and I take issue with the gentleman from Kansas when he says that it imposes a higher duty; he shows that he has not been a student of the question of petroleum. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The law of 1897 imposes as much duty on importations from Russia as is imposed in Russia upon importations from the United States, and I want to show now, in answer to the gentleman, how much duty is imposed in Russia on oil that might be brought there from the United States.

I have here a letter from the Treasury Department, with certain exhibits attached, on this question, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 31, 1908.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 25th instant, requesting certain information regarding the rate and amount of duties chargeable on petroleum and petroleum products imported into the United States from foreign countries, I inclose herewith copies of Department's rulings of January 3, 1906 (T. D. 26961), and those of March 2, 1906 (T. D. 27170), in answer to your inquiries Nos. 1 and 4. I desire to state that the authority for the assessment of duties on petroleum and petroleum products is found in the closing proviso to paragraph 626 of the free list of the act of July 24, 1897. As the remaining inquiries of your letter have reference specially to statistical matters regarding the importation of petroleum and petroleum products, your letter has been referred to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor with a request that a reply be forwarded to you as to those inquiries.

Respectfully,

J. B. REYNOLDS,
Acting Secretary.

(T. D. 27170.)

Paraffin—Countervailing duty.

Under the proviso to paragraph 626, tariff act of 1897, the duty on paraffin manufactured in Germany from crude petroleum produced in Russia is at the rate of duty imposed by Russia on paraffin imported into that country from the United States.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 2, 1906.

SIR: Your attention is invited to the decision of the United States circuit court of appeals, second circuit, of January 10, 1906 (T. D. 27025), wherein it is held that your decision was correct in assessing countervailing duty upon certain paraffin, manufactured in Germany from crude petroleum produced in Russia, at the rate imposed by Germany on paraffin imported into Germany from the United States.

The merchandise the subject of this suit was entered and the duties liquidated at the German rate on paraffin before the Department's decision of July 12, 1904 (T. D. 25457), was promulgated, wherein it was held that products manufactured in one country from crude petroleum produced in another country should be assessed with duty at the rate imposed by the country of origin of the crude petroleum upon similar products imported into that country from the United States, and not at the rate levied upon crude petroleum imported into such country from the United States.

As neither the Board of United States General Appraisers, the United States circuit court, nor the United States circuit court of appeals had before it for consideration the correctness of the Department's construction of the proviso to paragraph 626, you are hereby instructed to follow T. D. 25457 to the end that a judicial determination of the Department's construction may be had.

Respectfully,

JAMES B. REYNOLDS,
Assistant Secretary.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, New York.

Duty on petroleum and petroleum products.

Rates of duty imposed by Russia on petroleum and products of petroleum imported from the United States.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 3, 1906.

SIR: Referring to Department's circular No. 113 of November 20, 1905, I have to advise you that the Secretary of State transmits, under date of the 29th ultimo, information received from the American ambassador to Russia from which it appears that the rates of duty imposed by that country on petroleum and products of petroleum imported from the United States are as follows:

"Black crude naphtha and all unpurified naphtha, 30 copecks per pood.

"Liquid products from the distillation of naphtha (kerosene, photolene, paraffin oil, grease, naphtha ether, gasoline, ligroin, benzine, etc.), 1 ruble 80 copecks per pood.

"Paraffin, 3 rubles 31½ copecks per pood gross weight.

"Vaseline (other than refined), same.

"Candles, of all sorts, 5 rubles 4 copecks per pood."

Respectfully,
(1495*l*.)

JAMES B. REYNOLDS,
Asistant Secretary.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, New York.

Upon refined petroleum imported from Russia, according to the statement I have just read, there must be collected a tariff duty of 1 ruble 80 copecks per pood, because that is the duty levied in Russia upon oils imported from the United States or from anywhere else to Russia—1 ruble 80 copecks per pood. The Treasury Department has never had occasion to figure out just exactly what this means, because none of it has ever been brought here. The law operates so as to absolutely exclude petroleum. One ruble contains 100 copecks, and 1 ruble is worth in our money about 51 cents. A pood is a Russian measure of weight and amounts to 36 pounds avoirdupois. If the gentleman will take the trouble to figure out the specific gravity of petroleum, as I have done, he will find that 6.11 gallons of crude oil at 61° Fahrenheit make 36 pounds avoirdupois, or a Russian pood. If the oil is refined it is a little lighter, but in round numbers 6 gallons of oil make a Russian pood. Therefore Russia imposes upon oils imported from the United States a tariff of at least 15 cents a gallon, perhaps a little more. Then, under the Dingley law, and under this proviso of such great advantage to the Standard Oil Company, if any oil were brought into this country from the only other oil region in the world worth speaking of, it would be taxed when it came to our ports at least 15 cents a gallon. Now, is there not a difference between 15 cents a gallon and 40 per cent ad valorem? Fifteen cents a gallon is just about three times as much or a little more than three times as much as 40 per cent ad valorem. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But I am not surprised to hear somebody on the other side defend the Standard Oil Company. No matter how nefarious a trust is, no matter how it is denounced, no matter how great a lawbreaker it is, you can always find some man on that side of the House ready to rise in his seat and defend it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In Russia they have two things which serve to demonstrate the fact that they are just emerging from barbarism—an infamous prison system and the protective tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.] God grant that the fight going on there now—the moral upheaval and the movement for freedom—may soon release that country from both these curses. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is an honest and capable man at the head of the Bureau of Corporations, and he has very recently prepared this report which I have here on the petroleum industry—a book of something over 900 pages—a report not prepared in the interest of the advocates of the protective tariff. Herbert Knox Smith has given the facts in this book, and he shows in tables he has prepared the enormous price differences the Standard makes in this country, as compared with the prices it makes abroad. I am not going to read these figures, nor even to print them in my speech, but I want to read some of the conclusions Commissioner Smith reaches from the tables he has so carefully prepared, and I read now from page 427 of this publication:

The policy of the Standard Oil Company in charging much higher prices to the domestic than in the foreign trade is an injustice and an injury to the American consumer, which is not compensated for by any material advantage to American producers of crude oil or to American labor.

Now, some man get up on the other side and defend the Standard Oil when I am through. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is not so much the low prices in foreign markets as the exorbitant prices in the domestic market which require condemnation.

And I want to say now that the tables printed in this book show that the Standard Oil makes a difference of 5 or 6 cents a gallon on an average right along between its home price and its New York export price for oil. In this country during the recent years when the products of the Standard Oil refineries were constantly going up the same products 3,000 miles away on the continent of Europe were continually going down.

It is probable that prices in some of the foreign markets during part of the time from 1903 to 1905 were absolutely unprofitable. This furnishes, however, no excuse for the great advance in domestic prices. American consumers of petroleum might, for the sake of securing and retaining markets for the products of American industry, be willing to pay prices high enough to enable the Standard temporarily to sell oil abroad at cost, or even a little below cost, and yet make a moderate profit on its combined sales in both foreign and the domestic markets.

American consumers ought not, however, to be expected to pay prices so exorbitant that when the Standard sells half of its products abroad for little or no profit, or even with a loss, its aggregate profits on domestic and foreign sales combined amount to 60 per cent a year on its capital stock, as was true in 1904 and 1905. (See Chap. XIII, Table 152.)

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Some difference between the domestic and foreign prices might be tolerated, but such enormous differences as have existed, taken in conjunction with the excessive profits of the Standard, are clearly indefensible. If the object of the Standard had been merely to create a market for American products, it could have considerably increased the consumption in the United States by reducing prices to a reasonable level.

Now, I ask permission to insert in my speech at this point four or five other excerpts about as long as this from the comments of Commissioner Smith on the Standard Oil industry, without reading them now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. The excerpts are as follows:

CHAPTER IX.—GENERAL CRITICISM OF EXPORT POLICY OF STANDARD OIL COMPANY.

SECTION 1.—INTRODUCTION.

It has been shown in the preceding chapter that the Standard Oil Company has, especially during 1904 and 1905, sold illuminating and lubricating oils abroad for very much less than the domestic prices. Before a final criticism may be made as to the Standard's export policy, it is, however, desirable to consider in addition to the prices certain conditions which have affected the foreign and domestic trade, respectively. The Standard Oil Company and its apologists have very frequently pointed to the enormous export business of the Standard as an evidence of the benefit of the concern to the country in furnishing an outlet for the products of American oil wells and American labor. It is often argued that the expansion of the export trade, or even the retention of it in the face of competition from foreign oils, necessitates at times the sale of products abroad at lower prices than in the United States. Apart from the question whether it is to the economic advantage of the people of the United States that domestic consumers should pay excessive prices for oil products in order to permit an increase or to prevent a decrease in the exportation of such products, there are certain considerations which show that the Standard Oil Company in its export policy has been actuated not by a desire to promote the interests of American crude-oil producers or of American labor, but solely by a desire to maintain and increase its control of the oil trade.

* * * * * * *

In 1902 began distinctly that disparity in movement between domestic and foreign prices which became so conspicuous in 1903. The domestic production increased somewhat over 1901, and this, together with a considerable decline in exports, increased the amount remaining for domestic consumption very considerably. The foreign production increased moderately, but the exports from the four principal foreign producing countries were less in 1902 than in 1901, and the total exports from these countries and the United States combined decreased more than 4 per cent. Notwithstanding this increase in the available domestic supply and decrease in the available foreign supply, the domestic price advanced and prices in export markets declined. Though the price changes were comparatively small, they appear to have been abnormal.

* * * * * * *

SECTION 6.—GENERAL CONCLUSIONS AS TO STANDARD'S FOREIGN POLICY.

The preceding analysis of the price policy of the Standard Oil Company in the export trade during recent years, as compared with its price policy in the domestic trade, shows two conspicuous facts. In the first place, while the prices of illuminating oil in the principal foreign markets have for years been relatively lower than the prices in the United States, this disparity became especially conspicuous during the years 1903, 1904, and 1905. During those years the domestic prices stood at a much higher level than for many years before, while prices in the principal foreign markets, particularly in 1904 and 1905, were sharply reduced, with the result that the average price in leading foreign markets, like the United Kingdom, Germany, and the Orient, stood at times from 2 to 3 cents below the average price in the United States, transportation costs, difference in quality of oil, etc., being taken into account.

* * * * * * *

The real reason for the entrance of the Standard into these foreign fields is its desire to get its products as cheaply as possible and its desire to maintain its dominant position. If the Standard can get supplies of petroleum products at various points throughout the world, it can save in transportation charges. Moreover, if the Standard could acquire a dominant position in the production or the refining of petroleum in those foreign countries which are now or are destined to become the principal exporters, aside from the United States, its control of the oil trade of the world would be more effectively assured. The Standard's one object is, evidently, to increase its control of the oil trade, regardless of its effects on the demand for products of American oil wells and American labor. Foreign governments, however, are well aware of the monopolistic tendencies of the Standard. In the Dutch East Indies and Burma the governmental authorities have prevented the Standard from getting a foothold, while in Roumania they have adopted measures to keep it from effecting a monopoly of production or of transportation of crude oil.

* * * * * * *

The practice of selling American products abroad at lower prices than in the domestic market is sometimes defended as a temporary expedient when there is a falling off in the home consumption. Under these conditions the practice may enable the manufacturer to keep his works in operation at full capacity, preventing hardship to his employees and derangement of the industry generally. Such a temporary exportation at low prices, however, is entirely different from the situation in the petroleum business, where from the beginning of the industry there has been an enormous export trade. American illuminating oil is indispensable to foreign consumers Moreover, the marked reduction of prices abroad during 1903 to 1905 was not attributable to any decline of consumption in the United States.

Again, the practice of selling products abroad for lower prices than are charged at home is sometimes defended by the argument that the increase in the total volume of business which is thus made possible reduces the cost of manufacture per unit so greatly that the domestic price, though higher than the foreign price, may yet be lower than would be possible in the absence of the export trade. This argument, again, has no application to the petroleum industry. Particularly from 1903 to 1905 the excess in the domestic price of illuminating oil, as compared with the prices in the leading foreign markets, was much greater than the entire cost of pipe-line transportation and refining. It is obvious, therefore, that, whatever small reduction in the cost of operation may have been attributable to the existence of a large foreign trade, the domestic consumer got no advantage from that reduction in cost.

* * * * * * *

The substantial monopoly which the Standard possesses in most parts of the United States, and the immense profits which it derives therefrom, largely furnish the sinews of war for conflicts in foreign countries. In the long run it is true that the Standard practically makes the people of the United States very largely bear the cost of its policy of domination in the world's markets.

The Treasury Department by its rulings can be depended upon always to add something to the stringency of the Dingley law. The proviso to which I have called attention has been construed so as to prevent the importation of the products of petroleum into this country from other countries, provided the crude petroleum originally came from Russia. Some time ago they attempted to import the products of crude petroleum from England to the United States, but the Treasury Department rushed to the protection of the Standard Oil and prevented it. The ruling of the Treasury Department, to which I have called attention, shows that it is impossible to import into this country from Germany paraffin, vaseline for manufacturing purposes, or candles made from crude petroleum which originated in Russia. The products so sought to be brought to this country are manufactured by citizens of Germany and belong to citizens of Germany, but Germany does not produce the raw material used in the manufacture of these products. Germany depends upon Russia for that, and Russia has a protective tariff affecting petroleum, as I have stated. Why further protect the Standard Oil and make possible these tremendous dividends by rearing a tariff wall under this proviso in the Dingley law against the products of petroleum that may come from Germany? Of course there is no demand for crude petroleum. The ordinary consumer has no use for the raw material, he simply wants the manufactured product; and under this law and under a Republican Administration the Treasury Department throws its protecting arm about the Standard Oil and says to Germany, "We will not permit you to interfere with this infant industry of ours."

The way to fight the Standard Oil is not to issue messages from the White House against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is a bluff, as these messages usually are. I learned early in life how to conduct a Fourth of July celebration and entertain your audience. You must keep always a rocket exploding in the air; they will never notice the falling sticks. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the policy pursued in the White House at the present time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Every day some new rockets explode in the air and until now the people have not commenced to notice the falling sticks. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the President really has a grievance against the Standard Oil Company, if he really thinks it ought not to collect every year and divide profits amounting to 60 per cent on its capital stock, he can furnish some sort of competition for the Standard Oil and cut down its profits by simply sending a message here advising the Congress to put petroleum and its products on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But you can not do it and keep your contract—the contract you made in 1896 when they were pouring their money, they and their friends, into the coffers of the Republican party until you had accumulated a corruption fund of $16,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That promise is not yet barred by the statute of limitations. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whenever you make a contract with a particularly objectionable and nefarious trust—one which is universally admitted to be such—you invariably keep it. You dare not now pass this bill or any bill like it.

You are starting out in this campaign to make of it a campaign of bluff—simply that and nothing more. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republican party proposes always to do a good many things after the election. If the returns show that they have a majority again in both Houses and have the Executive, then they say: "Our policies have been approved by the people; there is nothing else for us to do." [Applause on the Democratic side.] At the present time a new method has been devised by the Republican party to still further postpone the revision of the tariff, and they are beginning to announce themselves as being in favor of a tariff commission, the commission to be composed of experts and selected by the Republican managers, if they can carry the election this fall. The Republican idea of a tariff expert is a man who is either in favor of maintaining schedules just as they are or revising them upward. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Any man who advocates a different theory than this would not be a tariff expert, according to the Republican standard. He would be a visionary dreamer—unsafe and unsound. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And so, if they succeed in carrying the election again this fall, they are commencing to promise that they will give us an expert tariff commission to consider the tariff question, and they hope in this way to fool the people again.

We have been able to withstand three great defeats, and at the present time the Democratic party presents a united front to the enemy. You could not withstand three great defeats. You have not been able to stand three victories. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To-day your party is divided as it never has been before in its history. Why, you do not know who you are for for President [applause on the Democratic side] not a single man on the Republican side of this House. If there is anybody there who does know who he is for he is wise enough to keep still and say nothing about it. Occasionally you find a man from Illinois who says he is for the Speaker, and it is the wisest thing in the world to do that. If you are from Illinois, you can say to all the other candidates and their friends "We have got a candidate in our own State and therefore we have to be for him. If we did not have a candidate there, then we might be able to help you out."

You can find a few men from Indiana who will say they are for an Indiana candidate, but a great mass of candidates is accumulating, and troubles are in store for the Republican party. Already from the direction of Florida is approaching a dark cloud. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Down there we are told that ten or a dozen officeholders in the State of Florida got together and held a convention and all the negroes—and the negroes are the Republican party of the Southern States—got together and held another convention, and there are going to be contesting delegations from the State of Florida.

And you will probably square the matter, as you usually do, and keep solid with the negro vote in the North by admitting both delegations, with half a vote each. The other day in the State of Ohio you had snap primaries in order to get the State for Mr. Taft. About 10 per cent of the Republicans went to the polls and voted, and the others stood aside in sullen silence. They propose to hold another convention, and there will be contesting delegations from the State of Ohio. Are you going to admit them with half a vote each? Already anti-Taft delegates are being selected in the State of Missouri, and your troubles have only started. You have not enough courage on that side to say you are for the Speaker, because that means the end of White House dinners this winter for all of you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And you have not enough courage to say that you are for Taft, because that might interfere with your committee assignments, and so you remain quiet over there, without any backbone at all, and simply stand for nothing except the jobs you hold at the present time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is only one man in the Republican party who is spoken of as a candidate who really represents anything, and he represents money and the negroes, and that is Senator FORAKER. There would not be much of a Republican party in this country if it were not for the contributions from the trusts and it were not for the negro vote. There are 32,000 negroes of voting age in the State of New York; there are 19,000 negroes of voting age in the State of Indiana; there are 32,000 of them in Ohio; there are 29,000 of them in Illinois, and I might go through all these other Northern States that at times are considered doubtful. They would rarely be Republican States if it was not for the negro vote. You must take care of the negro vote, and you can not do it when you turn down FORAKER. If you do turn him down, if you do not nominate him—and he is the only man that is making a real fight for anything except the nomination—it will be necessary for you to buy every negro north of the Mason and Dixon line in order to get them to vote the Republican ticket. The President is drying up your sources of income from the trusts, and you may be without the money to do it. The Republican party making a campaign without money and without negroes would present a pitiful spectacle in this country. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask for ten minutes more.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will have to take the time from somebody else. But I will risk it and give the gentleman ten minutes anyway.

Mr. RAINEY. The Democratic party is the white man's party in this country—in the North as well as in the South. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have been able to make it a white man's party in the past, and we do not care how long it remains a white man's party.

We have been having a period of prosperity for twelve years, and for longer than that, in this country. For twelve years the sun has been shining when it ought to shine and the rain has been falling when it ought to fall, and men have been toiling on the farms of the West and in the workshops of the East and have been producing wealth as they never produced wealth before. This has not been a period of overproduction either, because until the last few months they did not have enough railroad cars in this country to move the crops from our Western farms and take back to the West the products of the East. Only last winter, so far were we from a period of overproduction, they did not have cars enough to carry coal to the men in the Northwest and their families who were freezing to death.

But all at once, after twelve years of this kind of prosperity, when the Republican party is still in power, intrenched as it never was before in its history, the wheels of commerce stopped. All at once from every direction there came the crash of failing banks. To-day in the streets of our large cities men are begging for work, women are begging for bread, and children are starving. When periods of depression have occurred before you charged them always to the party in power. Does the argument hold good now? [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have educated the people for twelve years to believe that prosperity depended upon one thing, and upon one thing alone, and that was the retention of the Republican party in power; and they have taken you at your word and have rolled up tremendous majorities in order to be prosperous and happy and in order to enjoy the plenty you promised them. What excuse are you going to make now? You charged us in 1896 with standing for a dollar that was worth only 50 cents. And yet a few days ago there was circulating in the country millions and millions of dollars' worth of certificates having back of them nothing but the fiat of a bank. I do not know how many of these certificates are still in circulation.

We made the fight for more money in 1896. You carried the election, but we won the fight. In 1896 we had a circulating medium of about $21 per capita; and now, with a population many millions larger, with a population of 87,000,000, according to the last statement issued by the Treasury Department we have a circulating medium of $35 per capita; and so thoroughly did we convert you to our idea in 1896 that to-day you are clamoring for millions and millions of dollars more. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We made the fight in 1896, the old fight, for the people. We followed it in later campaigns with a fight for free men in the islands of the seas. To-day we turn from the fight for free men in the islands of the seas and commence the fight for free men at home [renewed applause on the Democratic side]; and whenever there is no great party in this country willing to take up that fight and to continue it, then will "government of the people by the people and for the people" fade from the earth. [Applause.] We stand to-day by our guns, as we always have, training them upon the enemy, facing the direction from which the greatest danger comes. We are getting ready to make, in the approaching campaign, the old fight against special privilege, and to continue the old battle for the rights of the common people. We await the result with confidence. Now, I yield back my time, if I have any left. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL] makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I got?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has twenty-seven minutes remaining.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, eighteen months have passed since duly chosen delegates to certain State conventions, Democratic and Republican, upon deliberation, declared in their platforms that the then and now existing tariff schedules ought to be revised and that their revision should be effected at once.

When these declarations were made the delegates to the conventions and the people who sent them knew that the first session of the Sixtieth Congress would begin on the first Monday of December, 1907. They knew also that in the following year there would be a Presidential election, but their knowledge of these things did not deter them from making such pronouncements. It may be assumed, then, that the people of the States, where such conventions were held and such declarations made, were of the opinion that the needs of the country demanded a readjustment of the tariff rates, and that such readjustment was of greater importance to the country as a whole than any possible effect it might have upon the political situation; that it was better that the welfare of the nation should be promoted, even at the cost of introducing an element of uncertainty into the political contest, than that the people of the country should suffer unfair and unequal burdens in order to prevent new questions arising on the eve of a Presidential campaign.

Before this Congress assembled it was quite generally reported through the newspapers that the tariff law would not be revised or modified during the long term. Evidently some one, or some body of persons, assumed the power to determine what should be done and what should not be done by Congress, and it begins to appear that the assumption was justified.

The Members of this body, chosen by the electors of their respective districts and delegated to represent those districts in matters of legislation, desiring to serve those whose interests they do represent, have introduced bills in great number looking toward the revision of various schedules of the tariff law. Presumably these bills have been introduced in good faith and in response to the instructions of many of the voters of the country who send representatives to this House. In a country like this, boasting of its free government and of the rights of all its citizens and of the equal opportunities afforded to all, it might be expected that some of these bills would be advanced far enough to engage the attention and secure the consideration of all the Members of the House, and after a proper investigation and reasonable debate be passed or be rejected, as to all the Members of the Congress seemed most advisable. And yet it is an open secret, or perhaps no secret at all, that these bills affecting tariff schedules are not to come before the membership of this House, either for passage or even for debate. Congress itself has not determined this matter. The bar interposed is found neither in the Constitution nor in statute law, but some one has assumed the right to decide upon the advisability of these measures and to determine whether or not the Members of Congress may pass upon them. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

In his message of last December President Roosevelt said:

There should be no tariff on any forest product grown in this country; and, in especial, there should be no tariff on wood pulp; due notice of the change being of course given to those engaged in the business so as to enable them to adjust themselves to the new conditions. The repeal of the duty on wood pulp should, if possible, be accompanied by an agreement with Canada that there shall be no export duty on Canadian pulp wood.

A committee of the National Editorial Association, representing some ten thousand daily and weekly newspapers of the United States, petitioned Congress to remove the duty on wood pulp, printing paper, and material entering into the manufacture of printing paper. The Government Forester, after an extensive tour of inspection, declared that "in twenty years the timber supply in the United States on Government reserves and private holdings, at the present rate of cutting, will be exhausted, although it is possible that the growth of that period might extend the arrival of the famine another five years."

It is estimated that the forest area of the United States is from 500,000,000 acres to 700,000,000 acres, and about one-fifth of this area is made up of Government reservations.

The annual growth of our forests does not exceed the amount of wood used for lumber alone, and the annual consumption of wood is probably three times the annual growth.

It is claimed, and no doubt it is true, that an area as large as the State of Rhode Island is devastated every year by the paper manufacturers.

In view of these facts, is there any good reason why legislation looking to the removal of the duty on wood pulp and on print paper ought not to be considered now? Is not the power that can deny to Congress the right to legislate upon these matters too great a power to be exercised by any one man or by a coterie of limited number?

These are important facts and these demands are earnest demands. They deserve a better answer than that given upon this floor not long since by a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, who said, in substance, that these duties should not be removed without deliberation and a full examination of all matters connected with them, and then, laughingly, brushed the whole subject aside by calling attention to one bill for the removal of these duties in which, through an error of a stenographer, "white" paper was written instead of "print" paper. [Applause.]

No one has asked that these duties be removed without opportunity for full deliberation and a careful consideration of all questions connected with their removal, but Congress has been asked to deliberate upon these things, to examine them, and to decide whether or not these tariffs should be maintained for the benefit of the International Paper Company and the Association of Western Paper Makers, recently known as the "General Paper Company" and prosecuted by the Federal Government and compelled to disband.

On January 7 of this year the market price of the grade of paper used by the Minneapolis Tribune was $52 a ton. Until recently that grade of paper was purchased by the Tribune for $38 a ton. It consumes approximately 6,000 tons of paper per year. At $38 a ton its print-paper expense approximated $228,000 annually, while at the rate of $52 a ton it will be $312,000 a year, an increase of $84,000 a year. But that is not the end of the story. The publishers were unofficially notified of a probable still further increase of $10 a ton during the current year.

Of course this great increase is not directly due to the imposition of the tariff tax, which is, I believe, 30 cents per hundred, or $6 a ton. The paper trust and the paper association know how to take advantage of a tariff rate as well as the other trusts and monopolies. If a foreign competitor is attracted to the markets of this country by the high prices obtained from purchasers, and establishes agencies, offices, and all the necessary adjuncts of a permanent trade, at no inconsiderable expense, the price of print paper will go down. With $6 a ton advantage over the foreign paper maker, our manufacturers, who make their paper with just as little expense, can sell at a profit of $5 a ton, and force the outsider, who pays $6 to enter the market, to sell at a loss of $1 a ton in order to meet their price. No wonder the territory is not invaded, but left to the control of the overcapitalized companies exploiting it and fattening on the high prices paid by the purchasers of print paper.

Yet the tariff must be let alone. This condition must continue. It is almost an offense to criticise it. This year there will be a Presidential election. Then will follow the short term of Congress. No time for revision. Then, unless an extra session be called, another election—a Congressional election—will be approaching, and the reasons for postponing tariff revision now may, with equal force, be urged then. [Applause.]

In the Indianapolis News, under date of January 6, appeared the following:

Speaker Cannon will not consent that a bill for a straight repeal of the duty on ground-wood pulp and on print paper shall come out of his Committee on Ways and Means; and all the stand-patters hold up their hands in holy horror at the thought of "precipitating a tariff debate in the Senate" by handing to that body such legislation by the House. If there is any hope at all it is along the line of legislation removing the duty on print paper only.

Recently the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] told us how the Standard Oil Company obtained protection under the provisions of the Dingley-Aldrich law. Approximately one-half of the world's production of petroleum comes from the United States; nearly an equal amount is produced in Russia, and a comparatively small amount by all the other countries in the world. Eliminate the Russian competition and all outside competition worth mentioning is eliminated.

Russia imposes a duty upon petroleum, and because of that fact petroleum coming to this country from Russia is subject to a tariff tax under this clause of the law:

Provided, That if there be imported into the United States crude petroleum, or the products of crude petroleum produced in any country which imposes a duty on petroleum or its products exported from the United States, there shall in such cases be levied, paid, and collected a duty upon said crude petroleum or its products so imported equal to the duty imposed by such country.

But the edict has gone forth that the tariff must be let alone. You may censure the Standard Oil Company as much as you please; condemn it because it suffers no competitor to thrive within this broad domain; prosecute it in the Federal courts; denounce it from the public platforms, but when it comes to a removal of the tariff tax behind which it shields itself from competition, and by aid of which it maintains the monopoly of which you complain, then the powers that be, beaming with patriotism and consumed with love of the plain people cry, "Hands off."

It will not do to disturb any tariff schedule prior to a Presidential election. [Applause.]

For good and sufficient reasons there has been no attempt to disturb this particular provision since the enactment of the tariff law a decade ago.

The gentleman from Wisconsin might have gone further in his investigations. He might have pointed out that bituminous coal imported into this country is subject to a tariff tax of 67 cents a ton, that anthracite coal apparently is admitted free of duty. He might have found another clause in the law very like the petroleum provision that attracted his attention and which he termed a "little joker."

Paragraph 415 of Schedule "N" reads as follows:

Coal, bituminous, and all coals containing less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, and shale, 67 cents per ton of 28 bushels, 80 pounds to the bushel.

No doubt there is anthracite coal which is nearly pure carbon, but I fancy very little anthracite coal mined out of the United States, which, by any likelihood, may be imported into the United States contains more than 92 per cent of fixed carbon.

But it is an unnecessary and useless labor to investigate too curiously, for has it not been settled that Congress shall not legislate upon the tariff at this session?

Prices of lumber have been abnormally high, and the builders in the farming communities and in the cities have deplored the increased cost of building material. They are told that a tariff of $2 on a thousand feet of lumber does not affect the price at all; that purchasers of lumber in Canada and elsewhere have to pay just as much for it as purchasers in this country pay; that the imposition of this tax has no effect whatsoever upon prices, and that it does not enable the owners of the lumber supply to charge any more than they would charge if the tax were removed.

Why, then, retain it? If the high price of lumber is due to a great demand and a limited supply, and competitors from abroad can not and will not bring lumber here and sell it for less than the market prices of to-day, and if the tax does not enable the owners of lumber to obtain more for it by keeping out this foreign competition, then let the tariff be removed. If its removal will lessen the price, surely a long-suffering people ought to be relieved of an unjust burden. If it will not affect the price because the demand exceeds the supply, then its retention can not be of any benefit to the lumbermen. It appears that this tariff tax is either unjust or useless, and in either case it should be cut out.

In the Twelfth Annual Report of the Forestry Commissioner of Minnesota this statement is found:

I have been at pains to ascertain how much lumber the average farmer in Minnesota who opens up a farm of 160 acres would require for the construction of his farm buildings, including his dwelling, barn, and other necessary buildings, such as shelter for his implements, and find that it would be 30,000 feet, board measure. Also that the average cost of such lumber at present is $30 per 1,000 feet, amounting in all to $900. Now, this is the amount and value at present prices of the lumber required by the average farmer.

In calling attention to these particular commodities, it is not intended to attempt a complete statement of all the reasons for the removal of the tariff duties upon them, but very briefly to present what may be termed a "prima facie case." If there are reasons, and good reasons, why the duty on print paper and wood pulp, and the duty on coal, and the duty on petroleum, and the duty on lumber should be retained, then, undoubtedly, this Congress, after hearing those reasons and being convinced by them, would not remove such duties. On the other hand, if, in justice, they should be removed, then they would be stricken from the statute.

These questions are important enough to receive consideration. They affect the property of millions of Americans whose representatives are here, and they have the right to say to us, "Devote yourselves to these things and report your conclusions to us. Do not evade the responsibilities that rest upon you. Let the issues be fairly met. Let a record be made."

At the next election not only will a President be chosen, but Representatives to the Sixty-first Congress will be selected, and the people have a right to know whether the candidates seeking their votes favor a removal of unjust tariff rates or their maintenance. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

It is said that there is insufficient time to take up the tariff law and examine all its schedules. There is time to take up the tariff duties on articles and things like those to which reference has been made, and many other classes of goods manufactured in this country and controlled by trusts and combinations seeking to monopolize the trade. The protective laws were first enacted for the purpose of building up competitive markets here at home at that time without domestic manufactures. Our home market then was at the mercy of foreign manufacturers who could ship their merchandise here and in fixing their charges take advantage of the lack of domestic competition. It was believed that by means of tariff taxes manufacturers here would be encouraged to produce American-made goods and put them in the American markets and there compete with goods coming from over the seas. The protective tariff was not designed to serve as a shelter for trusts and a shield for monopolies. The beneficiaries of these laws enacted to aid them have in many cases taken advantage of them to crush competition. They have used the weapon so generously provided by the American people against that very people.

The representatives of the people have higher duties to perform than to play politics and to plan for the future of political parties. The foremost leaders of both the great parties stand for the people and against the interests and systems and combinations and associations and corporations that have been plundering them. Patriotic men may, at this time, be less mindful of political campaigns and partisan advantages and more concerned with the efforts of a people to rid themselves of the burdens imposed on them by overfed trusts and monopolies.

Is not there time for the consideration of those tariff schedules that affect commodities that monopolistic concerns trade in? The Dingley bill, which its friends have denominated a magnificent piece of tariff legislation, was completed in less than four months.

The President in his message, to which reference has been made, referring to a general revision of the tariff law rather than a change of particular items, says:

> The subject can not with wisdom be dealt with in the year preceding a Presidential election, because, as a matter of fact, experience has conclusively shown that at such a time it is impossible to get men to treat it from the standpoint of the public good.

This is rather a severe arraignment. Is it possible that this Congress can not take up the tariff schedules at this time and treat them from the standpoint of the public good? [Applause.] If it be so, then the electors of this country ought to send men here who at any time can take up important questions—questions that ought to be solved at once—and treat them from the standpoint of the public good. There must be some men in this country who can do it, and if the present course of nonaction is continued in a very few years they are quite likely to be commissioned to do it in place of the men who can not at certain times treat these questions from the standpoint of the public weal. [Renewed applause.]

Necessary tariff legislation ought not to be postponed.

A large number of gentlemen who claim to be protectionists, but who think that tariff laws should be divorced from politics, came here to urge the appointment of a tariff commission. They seemed to know where it was necessary to go in order to learn whether or not Congress would listen to their petition. Members of this House learned through the newspapers that no tariff commission would be established.

How great the power this unseen autocratic body exercises! Conventions make their appeals, Congressmen introduce their bills, ten thousand newspaper publishers humbly petition, a phalanx of stalwart protectionists urge their plan, and millions of the American people protest against unjust and excessive taxes, but all to no avail. The controlling bureau, the autocratic coterie, is unmoved. The ukase goes forth. There shall be none of it."

But the people are thinking all this time, and they are thinking hard. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the great favor of the gentleman, and shall not worry the patience of the House nor consume much of its time. I here present the petition for your consideration. It explains itself.

Mr. Chairman, in general debate alone on the great supply bills or others that must be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union can any Member appropriately take the floor for any remarks on a question not germane to the matter in hand? In my long service here, the older Members all know that I have never taken the floor except to appeal for a right denied the people who sent me here or to oppose some injury threatened them. My reward for this course has been found in the attention you have invariably given me. You all remember the intense parliamentary battle fought out on this floor and in the Senate—a fight, the intensity of which has not been reached or touched since the historic conflict over the change of the rules led by the lamented Thomas B. Reed on his election to the Speakership of this great body.

That victory against joint statehood was won, and if I were called on now to pass from life to the dust that waits all life I would desire most to be treasured in the hearts of those whose confidence has sent and kept me here by reason of my course in preventing, as far as my energy, industry, and intelligence could, the unholy, unnatural, unjust, iniquitous union of two great western empires—Arizona and New Mexico—as one State of the Federal Union; but I did not take the floor to discuss that question, but what I have thus far said has been by way of introduction to this House of a remarkable as well as a most touching and pathetic petition just received by me from the county in which I live. It is signed by men, every one of whom is over 70 years of age, and nearly every one of whom blesses me with his confidence and friendship. Ordinarily I content myself, as you all do, in presenting a petition to Congress to merely present it and have it referred to the appropriate committee of this House, and that is usually the last of it. I must in this case digress from my usual rule, for those who have spoken in this petition have the right to be heard here.

The petition is as follows:

To the President and Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of the county of Pima, Territory of Arizona, and each of us qualified electors of said county, most respectfully petition the President and Congress that the Territory of Arizona shall be admitted as a State of the American Union. Our especial reason for petitioning as aforesaid at this time is that each and all of us are over the age of 70 years, and our opportunities for voting for a President of the United States are passing with our added years. We are desirous of exercising the great privilege of voting once more for a President of the United States.

We believe that the Territory of Arizona, on account of the worth, enterprise, and public spirit of her citizens, is entitled to admission as a State, and we hope to impress upon the President and Congress of the United States the duty of making such admission not only as a matter of right to the entire citizens of the Territory, but we feel that the great pleasure which will be afforded to us by the opportunity to vote at the next Presidential election should afford a pleasure to the President and Congress to receive our recommendation in this, our appeal, and we trust that our petition will receive a general and just recognition by the President and the Congress of the United States, and your petitioners will ever pray.

Dated, Tucson, Ariz., December 9, 1907.

Signed by— WILLIAM HERRING (and 47 others).

This petition is signed by more than fifty of these grand old men, who, while you were surrounded with all the comforts of life, indulging in the luxurious ease of an advanced civilization, were building an empire at a cost of labor and hardship, trial and danger which you are unable even to imagine, building with a fortitude that ignored pain and privation, with a courage that saw, but feared not, danger.

And what reward have you given them for this work? Indians despoiled the homes of some of these men, and many others like them who have passed, pray God, to a reward which their country ignored. These men and those who have gone made civilization possible on the face of the forbidding desert—tunnelled the mountains, and poured into the lavishing arteries of trade the pure rich stream of golden blood that saved the life of the country more than once in its recent history. Such men as these, who speak through me to you, paved the way, after blazing the trail for that great number of younger man, who, inspired by their example, have made the West the most generous, the bravest, the truest, the most patriotic, and unselfishly loyal manhood that graces to-day the broad domain over which our banner floats. Yet, I repeat, what have you done for them?

You have prevented early settlers from the just recovery of claims for Indian depredations; you have sent a horde of strangers to fill their offices; you have turned a deaf ear to their every cry for justice, and yet they love their country and their flag, and would willingly surrender their few remaining days to the call in her defense. It staggers your belief, but it is true. What do they ask? They make no boast. Western settlers were not swashbucklers. They ask statehood for the country they made; they ask, like men, for the right of representation—representation to which they are entitled, by every requirement that Congress has ever demanded of any other people in all its history. Treat them as you may, the people by whom their age is surrounded will reverence, love, and cherish them, and, let us hope, that in this they may find some compensation for the violated promises of Congress; for its present refusal to grant their declining years the justice their labor deserves. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill contains some astounding propositions. While realizing fully the difficulties that the committee must meet in a matter of this kind, it seems incredible that certain recommendations are made and others that should have been made omitted. It is the duty of that committee to act in a businesslike way, free from anything that might influence them in arriving at a just and proper conclusion. However, it would appear that the members of that hard-working and trying committee, some of whom would certainly fall under the unfortunate ban of having lived long and useful lives, would not be guilty of agreeing to the following item found on page 166, section 3, of the bill, which reads as follows:

The appropriations herein made for the officers and clerks and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for compensation of any persons incapacitated for performing the service for which such person has been employed, and the heads of Departments shall cause this provision to be enforced either by demotion or removal of such person from the public service.

If enacted into law, it will add undue strength to the powers now vested in chiefs of rooms and divisions, enabling them to easily make room for friends and favorites. It will undoubtedly bring about the removal of hundreds of deserving men and women whose only fault is that they have grown old in the service. In most cases of removal or demotion poverty will stare them in the face. In my judgment it is wrong, and in its present shape should not become a law. As I recall it, a somewhat similar proposition was in the bill last year, but went out on a point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], himself a living refutation of the charge of incapacity on account of years.

The same may be said of the distinguished gentleman having charge of the measure, namely, Mr. BINGHAM, the father of the House, and the Member from Georgia, Mr. LIVINGSTON, the able ranking member of the minority members of the committee. None of these distinguished gentlemen and statesmen, though up in years, deserve to be Oslerized or relegated to the walks of private life. [Applause.] I am personally acquainted with many employees of the Government who have passed the three score period of life, who might be classed by a young and frivolous upstart in charge of a room or a division with being incapacitated, and thus be either dismissed or degraded by being demoted. I have in mind a woman 80 years of age, the widow of a gallant officer who lost his life on the battlefield of the civil war, who rarely misses a day and is competent to perform the duties of the position she so ably fills. I will cite one more of the many similar cases with which I am familiar. The law clerk of one of the auditing divisions of the Treasury, who has been there for forty years, and a regular encyclopedia of legal knowledge, who lost an arm in fighting the battles for his country's flag, a gallant officer of our brave volunteers, the admiration of the world, and though nearly 70, is a zealous and loyal official of the Government, whose head might, in the near future, be in danger should this proposition pass. This party receives the salary of $2,000 a year, which, in my judgment, is less than one-half of what similar services and ability would command in any of our large cities. Now, these are fair examples of the condition of things in the various Departments. If the Congress believes that these old and faithful servants of the Government should give away to younger persons, a pension or retirement fund should be provided for them. Fifteen years ago, as a member of the board of education of the city of New York, I found many teachers and principals in the schools who had been teaching for forty years or more, but unable to retire on account of poverty. As is well known, the exactions of teaching and maintaining discipline is a most trying profession. Something had to be done, so a retirement bill was passed by the board of education and approved by the State legislature, giving those incapacitated and who have seen thirty or more years of service a pension of one-half their salary, not to exceed $1,000 yearly. This has since been raised to $1,500 a year. Within a few years, quite a number of old teachers, mostly voluntarily, took advantage of this law, and relieved the splendid system of public education so ably presided over for twenty-three years by that prince of educators, Hon. John Jasper. The retirement of the teachers has been found to be a great benefit to the cause of education and a blessing to those who had given their lives to the noble work.

Let Congress be as humane and patriotic as the great Democratic city of New York, and then incorporate such a law on the nation's statute books. Until that is done, feeling men, men with humane, sympathetic hearts will not agree to thrust hundreds of good, zealous men and women, who have grown old in the service of the Government, on the cold charity of the world. [Applause.] This bill provides for a few increases, very properly, in my judgment. The character, ability, and intelligence required in the State, Army and Navy, the Interior, Post-Office, Commerce and Labor, and other Departments is of so high an order that $6,000 is not too much. I regret that the committee did not recommend a larger increase. It has been my privilege to come in contact, officially, with most of these gentlemen, and I am glad to be able to say that they are all men of exceptionally superior attainments, men of high character, and always gentlemanly in the discharge of their arduous duties. While this meets my hearty approval, I have an indictment to bring against the great Committee on Appropriations. Why did they overlook the thousands of others who are justly entitled to an increase in compensation? It is generally admitted, I think, that the cost of living, food, rent, etc., has advanced 25 per cent in the last five years, making it extremely difficult for Government employees to make both ends meet. In my judgment the committee will do well to heed the recommendations made to the President recently by the Special Committee on Grades and Salaries. This committee, without any interest in the matter, recommends that an increase of 7.7 per cent more than is estimated for the next fiscal year be paid all Government employees. The committee should take this matter up and do justice to the most deserving class of men and women who have no superiors for zeal and devotion to duty anywhere in the country.

The great municipalities of the country are paying higher salaries, having made substantial increases in the last five years. Let justice be done the 15,000 or more employees of the Government, either by materially increasing the salaries, or in lieu of that, provide a pension for those who have grown old in the service. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks an article from the Washington Times of February 12:

OLD CLERKS MUST QUIT, SAYS BILL—MEASURE APPROPRIATING SALARIES ORDERS RETIREMENT—DEPARTMENT HEADS IN HUMOR TO ENFORCE PROPOSED LAW—ASSISTANT SECRETARIES GIVEN INCREASES BY SAME BILL.

Without warning, the long-feared blow has been prepared for the Government clerks of Washington by the House Committee on Appropriations.

In the legislative, executive, and judicial bill reported to the House by the committee providing for the payment of the salaries of all Government employees in Washington it is specified that aged and superannuated employees shall be demoted or dismissed without pension or compensation.

The language in which the provision is couched is emphatic and mandatory, compelling compliance, and not leaving the enforcement of it to the discretion of heads of departments.

It reads as follows:

"The appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons incapacitated for performing the service for which such person has been employed, and the heads of Departments shall cause this provision to be enforced, either by the demotion or removal of such person from the public service."

For the last three years there has been constant agitation before the Committee on Appropriations for the retirement of superannuated clerks on a pension or without pension. The committee has heard, in various ways and at various times, many plans advanced for dealing with the question of how to make the Government service economical by removing from it aged employees. There has been much discussion of a civil pension list, and various bills for such an arrangement have been introduced.

MAY BRING POVERTY TO THOUSANDS.

This year the committee has discarded all idea of pensions and has struck at the root of the matter by inserting the brief paragraph that will bring anxiety and, in many cases, poverty to thousands of the inhabitants of the national capital.

An argument for this action by the committee was advanced by Secretary of the Interior Garfield, when he was before the subcommittee in discussing the appropriations relating to his Department. Mr. Garfield told in graphic language of the good results he had obtained from dismissing and demoting employees when there was the slightest complaint against their efficiency. He said he had saved much money to the Government, and had secured better results from his policy of dismissal and demotion.

This struck the committee as a good line of action, and the paragraph for general demotions and dismissals followed.

WILL ENFORCE LAW TO LETTER.

That the heads of departments will not be allowed to let the administration of the law be hampered by mercy and leniency is the general opinion at the Capitol to-day. The language of the statute allows them no such privilege, and, if they fail to enforce it, they will be called to account for it in the next session of Congress.

Such a provision has been put in the bill because the committee believes it will result in economy to the Government. If this economy can not be shown at the end of twelve months, the Committee on Appropriations will want to know the reason why.

One argument used against the new provision is that it will add strength to the powers already wielded by petty chiefs of rooms and divisions, and will give them opportunity to obtain in easy manner the demotion or dismissal of any clerks whom they dislike or against whom they are in any way prejudiced.

If it is finally voted into the bill, it is possible that an amendment will be offered to create a special board to determine the efficiency or superannuation of clerks. The objection is now made that the terms of the provision give the chiefs a latitude that allows them to strike anyone without mercy and according to their whims.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16882), the legislative appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have received the following letter from the Secretary of the Navy:

FEBRUARY 12, 1908.

SIR: The Navy Department has the honor to invite the attention of the Executive to the necessity for the enactment of legislation whereby the representatives of the Government may have such control of wireless telegraphy as will insure noninterference with official messages.

The Navy Department has, by order of the President, the control of the Government coast stations, but unofficial messages sent by these stations or by public vessels may be interfered with by other wireless stations operated either by commercial companies with a legitimate object or by irresponsible persons with malicious intent.

Frequent occasions have arisen to illustrate the possible consequences of wireless interference; on one occasion an important message to the President of the United States, while embarked on a naval vessel, was interfered with and held up for a considerable time by the workings of a commercial wireless station; and instances have occurred wherein the naval stations at Newport, Washington, and San Francisco have at different times been interfered with by persons operating with no serious object.

The recent international wireless telegraph convention at Berlin, to which the United States was a party, deals only with "wireless telegraph stations open to public service between the coast and vessels at sea," and, therefore, does not take cognizance of stations operated by private individuals for other than public service. It may be noted, however, that article 8 of the convention requires that: "The working of the wireless telegraph stations shall be organized, as far as possible, in such manner as not to disturb the service of other wireless telegraph stations."

In view of the foregoing, the Navy Department recommends that such legislation be enacted as will insure freedom of official messages from interference. To accomplish this the law should make it a punishable offense:

(a) To originate or transmit a false message purporting to be official;

(b) To break in and interfere with any wireless station while it is transmitting an official message;

(c) To refuse to cease or fail to cease sending a private wireless message when called upon to do so by an operator having an official message to be sent.

It will be noted that the enactment of law of the nature proposed would never seriously interfere with the legitimate working of commercial wireless installations. The restrictions suggested are intended to apply particularly to times of peace. During war it is contemplated that much more extensive prohibitions would be exercised, to be put into effect in the absence of legislation by Executive proclamation as a belligerent right.

I am, sir, with great respect,

V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

I cordially indorse all that is above stated, and recommend the passage of such legislation as will accomplish the desired end.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 13, 1908.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 13, 1908.

RESURVEY OF CERTAIN LANDS, NEBRASKA.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13577) for a resurvey of certain public lands in the State of Nebraska.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be made a resurvey of the lands in township 25 north, range 15; township 33 north, range 16; township 33 north, range 16; township 26 north, range 31; township 34 north, range 32, and township 24 north, range 46, all west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska; and all rules and regulations of the Interior Department requiring petitions from all settlers asking for a resurvey and agreement to abide by the result of the same, so far as these lands are concerned, are hereby abrogated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair the present bona fide claim of any actual occupant of said lands so occupied: Provided further, That before any survey is ordered it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the former official survey of said lands is so inaccurate or obliterated as to make it necessary to survey the land, and only such parts of the land where the survey is so inaccurate or obliterated shall be surveyed.

With the following amendment:

In lines 5 and 6, after the word "fifteen," strike out the words township 33 north, range 16; township 33 north, range 16."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask how much land is included in this resurvey?

Mr. KINKAID. Four townships.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the reason for it?

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, these resurveys are necessary because no corners can be found and homestead entrymen can not ascertain where they should place their improvements, especially their houses and barns and other improvements of a permanent character. It is, I maintain, an obligation of the Government to so restore these now obliterated surveys which were properly made in the first instance and improve others which were imperfectly made as to enable homestead entrymen to readily identify the numbers of the land which they may choose for their homes and homesteads. The condition is such at this time that great confusion exists and much inconvenience experienced on account of the lack of evidences of surveys to properly advise home seekers, settlers, and even surveyors. Most of these lands were surveyed nearly forty years ago and, while the surveys in some instances were evidently imperfect, in other instances, however perfect they may have been, they have become wholly obliterated by prairie fires and other causes, so that the home seeker is as helpless in identifying the numbers of the land he would take as a homestead as if no survey had ever been made. I repeat, the Government owes it to the homesteader to start him out with a good survey.

Mr. PAYNE. I think it is all right so far, but I notice something in the law about releasing contracts already made.

Mr. KINKAID. No, there is no contract about it. What you have in mind has reference to a former practice of the Department of the Interior of requiring all settlers to be affected by a resurvey to enter into a contract to be bound by such resurvey, and the provision referred to in this bill merely excuses the making of such a contract. Besides, there never was any law providing for such a contract or such a survey or resurvey made pursuant thereto, and the reference to such a practice in this bill is a legal superfluity.

Mr. MANN. It releases them from a petition signed by everybody.

Mr. KINKAID. It releases them from a practice that grew up in the Interior Department, but there was no statute requiring it.

Mr. PAYNE. There is, then, something in it about releasing from an agreement.

Mr. MANN. No; it does not require them to make any form of an agreement?

Mr. KINKAID. They are released from making any agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman, reserving the right to object, if this is the unanimous report of the committee

Mr. KINKAID. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What committee

Mr. KINKAID. The Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No objection was made to it in committee?

Mr. KINKAID. No; and it was referred to the Secretary of the Interior and report made thereon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Recommended by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes, virtually; for no objection was made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KINKAID, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LAFEAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Robert Thomas Doyle (H. R. 25201), Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.
